Superstitions about Animals

ANT When ants are unusually busy, foul weather is at hand

Ants never sleep —Emerson, Nature, iv

Ants lay up food for winter use —

Prov vi 6-8, xxx 25

Ants' eggs are an antidote to love

ASS The mark running down the back of an ass, and cut at right angles over the shoulders, is the cross of Christ, impressed on the animal because Christ rode on an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem

Three hairs taken from the "cross" of an ass will cure the hooping-cough, but the ass from which the hairs are plucked will die

The ass is deaf to music, and hence Apollo gave Midas the ears of an ass, because he preferred the piping of Pan to the music of Apollo's lute

BARNACLE A barnacle broken off a ship turns into a Solan goose

Lift your Scotch barnacle now n block

Instantly a worm and presently a great goose.

Marston The Malecontent (1604)

BASILISK The basilisk can kill at a distance by the "poison" of its glance

There's not a glance of thine

But like a basilisk comes winged with death

Lee Alexander the Great v. 1 (1678)

BEAR The cub of a bear is licked into shape and life by its dam

So watchful Bruin forms with plastic care

Each growing lump and brings it to a bear

Pope The Dunciad l. 101 (1723)

BEAVER When a beaver is hunted, it bites off the part which the hunters seek, and then, standing upright, shows the hunters it is useless to continue the pursuit—Eugenius Philalethes, Brief Natural History, 89

BEES If bees swarm on a rotten tree, a death in the family will occur within the twelvemonth

Swarmed on a rotten stick the bees I spied

Which erst I saw when Goody Dobson died.

Gry Pastoral v (1714)

Bees will never thrive if you quarrel with them or about them

If a member of the family dies and the bees are not put into mourning, they will forsake their hive

It is unlucky for a stray swarm of bees to flight on your premises

BEEBLE Beetles are both deaf and blind

CAT When cats wash their ears more than usual, rain is at hand

When the cat washes her face over her ears, wee shall have great shore of raine.—Melton Astrologaster 45

The sneezing of a cat indicates good luck to a bride

Crasina nuptura lux est pro-perrima sponsa

Felix felis bonum sternum omen amor

Robert Keuchen Crepundia, 413

If a cat sneezes thrice, a cold will run through the family

Satan's favourite form is that of a

HAIR If a dog bites you, any evil consequence may be prevented by applying three of the dog's hairs to the wound.

Take the hair it is well written
Of the dog by which you're bitten
Work off one wire by his brother
And one labour by another
A Latin (ascribed to Aristophanes)

HARE It is unlucky if a hare runs across a road in front of a traveller. The Roman augurs considered this an ill omen.

If a hare cross the way they suspect they shall be robbed or come to some mischance.—Lamartine, Le Désert, l. 273 (1807).

It was believed at one time that hares changed their sex every year.

HEDGEHOG Hedgehogs foresee a coming storm.—Bodenham, Garden of the Muses, 153 (1600).

Hedgehogs fasten on the dugs of cows, and drain off the milk.

HORSE If a person suffering from hooping-cough asks advice of a man riding on a palfrey horse, the malady will be cured by doing what the man tells him to do.

JACKAL The jackal is the lion's provider. It hunts with the lion, and provides it with food by starting prey as dogs start game.

LADY-BUG It is unlucky to kill a lady-bug.

LION The lion will not injure a royal prince.

Fetch the Numidian lion I brought over
If he be afraid from royal blood the lion
Will do her reverence else he will tear her —De Witt and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1617)

The lion will not touch the true prince.—Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV, act II, sc. 4 (1595)

The lion hates the game-cock, and is jealous of it. Some say because the cock wears a crown (its crest), and others because it comes into the royal presence "booted and spurred."

The fiercest lion trembles at the crowing of a cock.—Pliny, Natural History, viii. 1

According to legend, the lion's whelp is born dead, and remains so for three days, when the father breathes on it, and it receives life.

LIZARD The lizard is man's special enemy, but warns him of the approach of a serpent.

MAGPIE To see one magpie is unlucky, to see two denotes merriment or a marriage, to see three, a successful journey, four, good news, five, company.—Grose

Another superstition is "One for sorrow; two for mirth, three, a wedding, four, a death."

One a sorrow two a mirth
Three a wedding four a birth
Five a christening six a death
Seven a heaven eight a hell
And nine a the devil blame sol

Old Scotch Rhyme.

In Lancashire, two magpies flying together is thought unlucky.

I have heard my granny say, hoodoo or leef o saen two old harries as two ymoos (magpies).—Tim Bobbin, Lancashire Dialect 31 (1778)

When the magpie chatters, it denotes that you will see strangers.

MAN A person weighs more fasting than after a good meal.

The Jews maintained that man has three natures—body, soul, and spirit. Diogenes Laertius calls the three natures body, phren, and thumos, and the Romans called them manēs, anima, and umbra.

There is a nation of pygmies.

The Patagonians are of gigantic stature.

There are men with tails, as the Gihlanes, a race of men "beyond the Senaar," the Niam-niams of Africa, the Narea tribes, certain others south of Herrar, in Abyssinia, and the natives in the south of Formosa.

MARTIN It is unlucky to kill a martin.

MOLE Moles are blind. Hence the common expression, "Blind as a mole."

Pray you tread softly that the blind mole may not Hear a footfall.

Shakespeare, The Tempest, act IV, sc. 1 (1609)

MOON-CALT, the offspring of a woman, engendered solely by the power of the moon.—Pliny, Natural History, x. 64.

MOUSE To eat food which a mouse has nibbled will give a sore throat.

It is a bad omen if a mouse gnaws the clothes which a person is wearing.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, 214 (1621).

A fried mouse is a specific for small-pox.

OSTRICH An ostrich can digest iron.

Erephen I could eat the very hilts for anger Knowell A sign of your good digestion you have an ostrich stomach.—J. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour III, 1 (1598).

I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich and swallow my sword.—Shakespeare, 2 Henry VI, act IV, sc. 10 (1591).

OWL If owls screech with a hoarse and dismal voice, it bodes impending calamity. (See OWL, p. 718).

The owl that of death the body bringeth
—Chaucer, Assembly of Foules (1358)

PELICAN A pelican feeds its young brood with its blood.

The pelican turneth her beak against her breast, and therewith pierceth it till the blood gush out, wherewith she nourisheth her young.—Eugenius Philastrius, Brief Natural History 92.

Than sayd the Pellycane,
When my byrds be slayne
With my bloud I them reuyne [verree]"
Scripture doth record
The same dyd our Lord
And rose from deth to lyue [life].
Skelton Armoury of Byrds (died 1529)
And like the kind life-rendering pelican
Repat them with my blood
Shakespeare Hamlet act iv sc 5 (1596)

PHŒNIX There is but one phoenix in the world, which, after many hundred years, burns itself, and from its ashes another phoenix rises up

Now I will bellow that in Arabia
There is one tree the phoenix throne one phoenix
At this hour reigning there
Shakespeare The Tempest act III. sc. 3 (1609)

The phoenix is said to have fifty orifices in its bill, continued to its tail. After living its 1000 or 500 years, it builds itself a funeral pile, sings a melodious elegy, flaps its wings to fan the fire, and is burnt to ashes

The enchanted pile of that lonely bird
Who sings at the last his own death lay
And in music and perfume dies away
T Moore, Lalla Rookh (Paradise and the Peri" 1817)

The phoenix has appeared five times in Egypt (1) in the reign of Sesostris, (2) in the reign of Amasis, (3) in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos, (4) a little prior to the death of Tiberius, and (5) during the reign of Constantine Tacitus mentions the first three (Annales, vi 28)

PIG In the fore feet of pigs is a very small hole, which may be seen when the pig is dead and the hair carefully removed. The legend is that the devils made their exit from the swine through the fore feet, and left these holes. There are also six very minute rings round each hole, and these are said to have been made by the devils' claws (Mark v 11-13)

When pigs carry straws in their mouth, rain is at hand

When swine carry bottles of hay or straw to hide them, rain is at hand.—The Husbandman's Practice 137 (1664)

When young pigs are taken from the sow, they must be drawn away backwards, or the sow will be fallow

The bacon of swine killed in a waning moon will waste much in the cooking

When hogs run grunting home, a storm is impending.—The Cabinet of Nature, 262 (1637)

It is unlucky for a traveller if a sow crosses his path

If going on a journey on business, a sow cross the road you will meet with a disappointment. If not an accident before you return home.—Groza.

To meet a sow with a litter of pigs is very lucky

If a sow is with her litter of pigs it is lucky and denotes a successful journey.—Groza.

Langley tells us this marvellous bit of etymology "The bryde anynteth the poostes of the doores with swynes grease, to dryve awaye misfortune, wherefore she had her name in Latin uroi, 'ab ungendo' [to anoint]"—Translation of Polydore Vergil, 9

PIGEON If a white pigeon settles on a chimney, it bodes death to some one in the house

No person can die on a bed or pillow containing pigeons' feathers

If anybody be sick and lie a dying if they [sic] lie upon pigeons feathers they will be languishing and never die but be in pain and torment.—British Apollo II. No 93 (1710)

The blue pigeon is held sacred in Mecca—Pitt

PORCUPINE When porcupines are hunted or annoyed, they shoot out their quills in anger

RAT Rats forsake a ship before a wreck, or a house about to fall

They prepared
A rotten carcass of a boat the very rats
Instinctively had quit it
Shakespeare The Tempest act I. sc 2 (1609)

If rats gnaw the furniture of a room, there will be a death in the house ere long—Grose

 The bucklers at Lanuvium being gnawed by rats, presaged ill fortune, and the battle of Marses, fought soon after, confirmed the superstition

The Romans said that to see a white rat was a certain presage of good luck—Pliny, Natural History, viii 57

RAVEN Ravens are ill-omened birds
The hoarse night raven trompe of doleful dreere.
Spenser

Ravens seen on the left hand side of a person bode impending evil

Sape sinistra cara praedixit ab illice cornix
Virgil Ecl I

Ravens call up rain

Mark
How the curst raven with her harmless voice
Invokes the rain!
Smart Hop Garden II (died 1770)

When ravens [? rooks] forsake a wood, it prognosticates famine

This is because ravens bear the character of Saturn the author of such calamities.—Athenian Oracle (supplement, 4, 6)

Ravens forebode pestilence and death

Like the sad presaging raven that tells
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak
And, in the shadow of the silent night
Dots shake contagion from her sable wing.
Marlowe, The Jew of Malta (1593)

Ravens foster forsaken children

Some say that ravens foster forlorn children
(1) Shakespeare Titus Andronicus act II. sc. 3 (1593).

It is said that king Arthur is not dead, but is only changed into a raven, and will in due time resume his proper form and rule over his people gloriously.

The raven was white till it turned fell-tale, and informed Apollo of the faithlessness of Ceramus. Apollo shot the nymph for her infidelity, but changed the plumage of the raven into inky blackness for his officious prating — Ovid, Metamorphoses, ii.

He (Apollo) blacked the raven's eye
And dabbled in the white plumage more
As he was punishing Ceramus.

If ravens gape against the sun, heat will follow, but if they busy themselves in preening or washing, there will be rain.

RAMORA. A fish called the ramora can arrest a ship in full sail.

All that I dare to tell you is
That when a ship is full of sail
And the wind is in the east
That when a ship is full of sail

ROBIN. The red of a robin's breast is produced by the blood of Jesus. While the "Man of sorrows" was on His way to Calvary, a robin plucked a thorn from His temple, and a drop of blood, falling on the bird, turned its bosom red.

Another legend is that the robin used to carry dew to refresh sinners parched in hell, and the roorching heat of the flames turned its feathers red.

Robin was the first to tell
And he told the world of sin
You can see the mark on his breast
Of fire that scorched his feathers in

If a robin finds a dead body unburied, it will cover the face at least, if not the whole body — Grey, On Shakespeare, li 226.

There is a red bird that is dead
His strawberry leaves do he over them
Lies in the West

It is unlucky either to keep or to kill a robin. If Pot says, if any one attempts to detain a robin which has sought hospitality, let him "fear some real calamity" — Poems (1780).

SALAMANDER. The salamander lives in the fire.

And a good house fire is kept up without either
To the fire in every year there is no doubt but that A salamander will be liberated in the chimney — J. I.
Andrews, Amusements, etc. 200.

The salamander seeks the hottest fire to breed in, but "soon quenches it by the extreme coldness of its body" — Pliny, Natural History, x 67, xxix 1.

Food touched by a salamander is poisonous — Ditto, xxix 23.

SPITTING. The human saliva is a cure for blindness — Ditto, xxviii 7.

If a man spits on a serpent, it will die — Ditto, vii 2.

The human saliva is a charm against fascination and witchcraft.

Thrive on my breast I spit to guard me
From fascination and witchcraft

Theocritus.

To unbent in the breast chest you must spit into the shoe of your right foot — Book of the Dead (1841).

Spitting for luck is a most common superstition.

For women generally spit upon their hands — Grey.

A blacksmith who has to shoe a stubborn horse, spits in his hand to drive off the "evil spirit."

The country smith spits in his hand to drive off the evil spirit
I know from Anna's Antiquary li

If a pugilist spits in his hand, his blows will be more telling — Pliny, Natural History, xxviii 7.

SCORPIONS. Scorpions sting themselves. Scorpions have an oil which is a remedy for their stings.

To cure a scorpion sting
To cure the wound the venom made
B. Butler, Antiquary, lii 2 (1678).

SPIDERS. It is unlucky to kill a money-spinner.

Small spiders called "money-spinners" promise a good luck if they are killed, or removed from the person whom they are touching themselves — J. I.

The bite of a spider is venomous. No spider will spin its web on an Irish oak.

Spiders will never set their webs on a cedar roof — Caughey, Letters (1815).

Spiders indicate where gold is to be found (See SPIDERS INDICATORS OF GOLD).

There are no spiders in Ireland, because St. Patrick cleared the island of all vermin.

Spiders envenom whatever they touch.

There may be in the cup
A spider's eye and one may drink and depart
And yet partake no evil
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale act ii. sc. 1 (1633).

A spider enclosed in a quilt and hung round the neck will cure the ague — Mrs. Delany, A Letter dated March 1, 1713.

I hung three spiders about my neck, and they drove my ague away — Elias Ashmole, Diary (April 11 1631).

A spider worn in a nutshell round the neck is a cure for fever.

Cured by the wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell.

Longfellow, Evangeline li (1844).

Spiders spin only on dark days.

The spider never spins
But on dark days his slimy glass
B. Butler, On a Nonconformist li

Spiders have a natural antipathy to loads.

STAG Stags draw, by their breath, serpents from their holes, and then trample them to death (Hence the stag has been used to symbolize Christ)—Pliny, Natural History, viii 50

STORK It is unlucky to kill a stork. According to Swedish legend, a stork fluttered round the cross of the crucified Redeemer, crying, Styrkê! styrkê! ("Strengthen ye! strengthen ye!"), and was hence called the styrk or stork, but ever after lost its voice.

SWALLOW According to Scandinavian legend, this bird hovered over the cross of Christ, crying, Stale! svalê! ("Cheer up! cheer up!"), and hence it received the name of svalê or swallow, "the bird of consolation."

If a swallow builds on a house, it brings good luck.

The swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone which gives sight to her fledglings.

Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings.

Longfellow Evangeline l. 1 (1849)

To kill a swallow is unlucky. When swallows fly high, the weather will be fine.

When swallows fleet soar high and sport in air
He told us that the welkin would be clear

Gray Pastoral l. (1714)

SWAN The swan retires from observation when about to die, and sings most melodiously.

Swans a little before their death sing most sweetly—Pliny Natural History x. 23

The swanne cannot hatch without a cracke of thunder—Lord Northampton Defensio etc. (1583)

TARANTULA The tarantula is poisonous.

The music of a tarantula will cure its venomous bite.

TOAD Toads spit poison, but they carry in their head an antidote thereto.

the toad ugly and venomous
Wears yet a precious jewel in its head
Shakespeare As You Like It act ii. sc. 1 (1600)

In the dog days, toads never open their mouths.

Fords are never found in Ireland, because St. Patrick cleared the island of all vermin.

UNICORN Unicorns can be caught only by placing a virgin in their haunts.

The horn of a unicorn dipped into a liquor will show if it contains poison.

VIPER Young vipers destroy their mothers when they come to birth.

WEASEL To meet a weasel is unlucky.—Congreve, Love for Love.

You never catch a weasel asleep.

WOLF If a wolf sees a man before the man sees the wolf, he will be struck dumb.

Men are sometimes changed into wolves—Pliny, Natural History.

WREN If any one kills a wren, he will break a bone before the year is out.

MISCELLANEOUS No animal dies near the sea, except at the ebbing of the tide.—Aristotle.

A parted even just between twelve and one seen at the turning of the tide.—Shakespeare Henry I act ii. sc. 3 (Falstaff's death, 1509)

SUPPORTERS in Heraldry represent the pages who supported the banner These pages, before the Tudor period, were dressed in imitation of the beasts, etc, which typified the bearings or cognizances of their masters

SURA, any one ethical revelation, thus each chapter of the Korân is a Sura

Hypocrites are apprehensive lest a Sura should be revealed respecting them, to declare unto them that which is in their hearts —Al Korân ix.

SURFACE (Sir Oliver), the rich uncle of Joseph and Charles Surface He appears under the assumed name of Premium Stanley

Charles Surface, a reformed scapegrace, and the accepted lover of Maria the rich ward of sir Peter Teazle In Charles, the evil of his character was all on the surface

William Smith (1730-1780). To portray upon the stage a man of the true school of gentility required pretenof no ordinary kind and Smith possessed these in a singular degree giving to Charles Surface "all that which was required for him the distinction of Gentleman Smith"—Life of Sheridan (Bohn's edit.)

Joseph Surface, elder brother of Charles, an artful, malicious, but sentimental knave, so plausible in speech and manner as to pass for a "youthful miracle of prudence, good sense, and benevolence." Unlike Charles, his good was all on the surface—Sheridan, School for Scandal (1777)

John Palmer (1717-1798) was so admirable in this character that he was called emphatically "The Joseph Surface"

Surgeon's Daughter (The), a novel by sir Walter Scott, laid in the time of George II and III, and published in 1827. The heroine is Menie Gray, daughter of Dr Gideon Gray of Middlemas. Adam Hartley, the doctor's apprentice, loves her, but Menie herself has given her heart to Richard Middlemas. It so falls out that Richard Middlemas goes to India. Adam Hartley also goes to India, and, as Dr Hartley, rises high in his profession. One day, being sent for to visit a sick fakir, he sees Menie Gray under the wing of Mde Montreville. Her father had died, and she had come to India, under madame's escort, to marry Richard, but Richard had entrapped the girl for a concubine in the harem of Tippoo Saib. When Dr Hartley heard of this scandalous treachery, he told it to Hyder Ali, and the father of Tippoo Saib, who were so disgusted at the villainy that they condemned Richard Middlemas to be trampled to death by a trained elephant, and liberated Menie, who returned to her native country under the escort of Dr Hartley.

Susan means "white lily." Susannah, "my white lily." Susa, in Persia, received its name from its white lilies (Hebrew and Persian)

Susanna, the wife of Joacim. She was accused of adultery by the Jewish elders, and condemned to death, but Daniel proved her innocence, and turned the criminal charge on the elders themselves—History of Susanna

Susannah, in Sterne's novel entitled The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman (1759)

Suspicious Husband (The), a comedy by Dr Hordly (1717). Mr Strietland is suspicious of his wife, his ward Jacinthia, and Clarinda a young lady visitor. With two attractive young ladies in the house, there is no lack of intrigue, and Strietland fancies that his wife is the object thereof, but when he discovers his mistake, he promises reform.

Sussex (The earl of), a rival of the earl of Leicester, in the court of queen Elizabeth, introduced by sir W Scott in Kennilworth

Sut'lème'me (4 syl), a young lady attached to the suite of Nouronihar the emir's daughter. She greatly excelled in dressing a salad.

Sutor Ne sutor supra Crepidam. A cobbler, having detected an error in the shoe-latchet of a statue made by Apellés, became so puffed up with conceit that he proceeded to criticize the legs also, but Apellés said to him, "Stick to the last, friend." The cobbler is qualified to pass an opinion on shoes, but anatomy is quite another thing.

Boswell, one night sitting in the pit of Covent Garden Theatre with his friend Dr Blair, gave an imitation of a cow lowing, which the house greatly applauded. He then ventured another imitation, but failed, whereupon the doctor turned to him and whispered in his ear, "Stick to the cow."

A wig-maker sent a copy of verses to Voltaire, asking for his candid opinion on some poetry he had perpetrated. The witty patriarch of Ferney wrote on the MS, "Make wigs," and returned it to the barber-poet.

Swallow Stone The swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone which gives sight to her fledglings. Off in the barns they clarked to the populous nests on the eiffers
Ec-listing with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swan
I bring from the shore of the sea, to restore the sight of his fledglings.
Longfellow Engelina 11 (1819)

Swallow's Nest, the highest of the four castles of the German family called Landschaden, built on a pointed rock almost inaccessible. The founder was a noted robber-knight (See "Swallow," p 960)

Swan Fionnuala, daughter of Lir, was transformed into a swan, and condemned to wander for many hundred years over the lakes and rivers of Ireland, till the introduction of Christianity into that island

1 Moore has a poem on this subject in his Irish Melodies, entitled "The Song of Fionnuala" (1814)

Scan (Ihe), called the bird of Apollo or of Orpheus (2 syl) (See "Swan" p 960)

Scan (Ihe Knight of the), Helias king of Lyleforte, son of King Ormant and Beatrice. This Beatrice had eight children at a birth, one of which was a daughter. The mother-in-law (Matabrune) stole these children, and changed all of them, except Helias, into swans. Helias spent all his life in quest of his sister and brothers, that he might disenchanted them and restore them to their human forms.—Thoms, Early English Prose Romances, iii (1858)

Swans and Thunder It is said that swans cannot hatch without a crack of thunder. Without doubt, thunder is not unfrequent about the time of the year when swans hatch their young

Swane (1 syl) or Swegen, surnamed "Hork-Beard," king of the Danes, joins Alaf or Olaf (Triggesson) in an invasion of England, was acknowledged king, and kept his court at Gainsbury. He commanded the monks of St Edmund's Bury to furnish him a large sum of money, and as it was not forthcoming, went on horseback at the head of his host to destroy the minster, when he was stabbed to death by an unknown hand. The legend is that the murdered St Edmund rose from his grave and smote him

The Danes landed here again
With their disorder'd troops by Alaf hither led
In calling their Swane but an English yet there

Who willed his secret wife in Swane's relentless gore, Drayton, Polyolbion xii. (1612)

Swanston, a smuggler—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Swaran, king of Lochlin (Denmark), son and successor of Starno. He invaded Ireland in the reign of Cormac II (a minor), and defeated Cathullin general of the Irish forces. When Fingal arrived, the tide of battle was reversed, and Swaran surrendered. Fingal, out of love to Agandeece (Swaran's sister), who once saved his life, dismissed the vanquished king with honour, after having invited him to a feast. Swaran is represented as fierce, proud, and high-spirited, but Fingal as calm, moderate, and generous—Ossian, Fingal.

Swash-Buekler (A), a riotous, quarrelsome person. Nash says to Gabriel Harvey, "Turpe senex miles, 'tis time for such an olde fool to leave playing the swash-buekler" (1598).

Swedenborgians (calling themselves the NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH) are believers in the doctrines taught in the theological writings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688-1772). The principal points are that Jesus Christ is the only God and contains a Trinity of attributes, salvation is attained by obedience to the Lord's commandments, the sacred scripture has a soul or spiritual sense, which exists among the angels, and this has now been revealed, "there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body," and man continues to live on without interruption in the spiritual world when he drops his material body at death.

Swedish Nightingale (The), Jenny Lind, the public singer. She married Mr Goldschmidt, and retired (1821-).

Sweedlepipe (Paul), known as 'Poll,' barber and bird-fancier, Mrs Gramp's landlord. He is a little man, with a shrill voice but a kind heart, in appearance "not unlike the birds he was so fond of." Mr Sweedlepipe entertains a profound admiration of Bailey, senior, whom he considers to be a cyclops in "of all the stable-knowledge of the time"—C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841).

Sweepclean (Saunders), a king's messenger at Knoel winnock Castle—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III).

Sweet Singer of Israel (The), David, who wrote several of the psalms.

Sweet Singer of the Temple, George Herbert, author of a poem called The Temple (1593-1633).

Sveno, son of the king of Denmark.

While bringing succours to Godfrey, he was attacked in the night by Solyman, and the head of an army of Arabs, and himself with all his followers were left dead before they reached the crusaders. Sveno was buried in a marble sepulchre, which appeared miraculously on the field of battle, expressly for his interment (ibk viii)—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Sveno Dani regis filius, cum mille quingentis equitibus cruce-lati-militis Iran in-leo ad Constantinopolem Iosapharum Inter Antiochiam ad reliquos Latinos iter faciebat. In illis Turcorum ad unum omnes cum regio Juvenc cast.—Iaso's Emilio History (1-33).

This is a very parallel case to that of Rhesus. This Thracian prince was on his march to Troy, bringing succours to Priam, but Ulysses and Diomed attacked him at night, slew Rhesus and his army, and carried off all the horses.—Homer, Iliad, v.

Swoetha, housekeeper of the elder Mertoun (formerly a pirate)—Sir W Scott, The Pirate (time, William III).

Swidger (William), custodian of a college. His wife was Milly, and his father Philip. Mr Swidger was a great talker, and generally began with, "That's what I say," a propos of nothing—C Dickens, The Haunted Man (1848).

Swim. In the swim, in luck's way. The metaphor is borrowed from the Thames fishermen, who term that part of the river most frequented by fish the swim, and when an angler gets no bite, he is said to have cast his line out of the swim or where there is no swim.

In university slang, to be in ill luck, ill health, ill replenished with money, is to be out of it (i.e. the swim).

Swimmers. Leander used to swim across the Hellespont every night, to visit Hero—Musæus, De Amore Herois et Leandri.

Lord Byron and lieutenant Ekenhead accomplished the same feat in 1 hr 10 min, the distance (allowing for drifting) being four miles.

A young native of St Croix, in 1817, swam over the Sound "from Cronenburgh [2 Cronberg] to Graves" in 2 hr 40 min, the distance being six English miles.

Captain Boyton, in May, 1875, swam or floated across the Channel from Grisnez to Fan Bay (Kent) in 23 hr.

Captain Webb, August 21, 1876, swam from Dover to Calais, a distance of about thirty miles including drift, in 22 hr 10 min.

H Gurr was one of the best swimmers.

Switzers, guards attendant on a king, irrespective of their nationality so called because at one time the Swiss were always ready to fight for hire

The king, in Hamlet, says, "Where are my Switzers?" i.e. my attendants, and in Paris to the present day we may see written up, Parlez au Suisse ("speak to the porter"), be he Frenchman, German, or of any other nation

For Locke and the Switzers may be liked to fight for anybody—Nashie Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1144)

Swiveller (Mr Dick), a dirty, smart young man, living in apartments near Drury Lane. His language was extremely slowery, and interlarded with quotations "What's the odds," said Mr Swiveller, a propos of nothing, "so long as the fire of the soul is kindled at the taper of conviviality, and the wing of friendship never moults a feather?" His dress was a brown body-coat with a great many brass buttons up the front, and only one behind, a bright check neckcloth, a plaid waistcoat, soiled white trousers, and a very limp hat, worn the wrong side foremost to hide a hole in the brim. The breast of his coat was ornamented with the elegant end of a very large pocket-handkerchief, his dirty wristbands were pulled down and folded over his cuffs, he had no gloves, and carried a yellow cane having a bone handle and a little ring. He was forever humming some dismal air. He said mon for "man," forquit, june, called wine or spirits "the rose," sleep "the blum," and generally shouted in conversation, as if making a speech from the chair of the "Glorious Apollers" of which he was perpetual "grand." Mr Swiveller looked amiably towards Miss Sophy Wackles, of Chelsea. Quilp introduced him as clerk to Mr Samson Brass, solicitor, Bevis Marks. By Quilp's request, he was afterwards turned away, fell sick of a fever, through which he was nursed by "the marchioness" (a poor house-draw), whom he married, and was left by his aunt Rebecca an annuity of £125

Is that a reminder to go and pay? said Trent, with a sneer. "Not exactly, Fred," replied Richard. "I enter in this little book the names of the streets that I can't go down while the shops are open. This dinner-to-day closes Long Acre. I bought a pair of boots in Great Queen Street last week, and made that no thoroughfare too. There's only one avenue to the Strand left open now, and I shall have to stop up that to-night with a pair of gloves. The roads are closing, so fast in every direction that in about a month's time unless my aunt sends me a remittance I shall have to go three or four miles out of town to get over the way."—C. Dickens. The Old Curiosity Shop (1840)

Sword (For the names of the most famous swords in history and fiction, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, 869) Add the following—

Ah's sword, /nlsagar

Koll the Thrall's sword, named Grey steel

Ogier the Dane had two swords, made by Munifican, viz, Sauvagine and Courtain or Curtana

He [Ogier] drew Courtain his sword from out its sheath. W. Morris Earthly Paradise 634

Strong-o'-the-Arm had three swords, viz, Baptism, Florence, and Graban made by Ansirs

Sword (The Marvel of the) When king Arthur first appears on the scene, he is brought into notice by the "Marvel of the Sword," and sir Galahad, who was to achieve the holy grail, was introduced to knighthood by a similar adventure. That of Arthur is thus described

In the greatest church of London there was seen in the churchyard against the high altar a great stone four yards like to a marble stone and in the midst thereof was an anvil of steel a foot in height and therein stuck a fair sword naked by the point, and letters of gold were written about the sword that said thus: "It bore pullerth out this sword of this stone and anvil is right wise king born of England." [Arthur was the only person who could draw it out and so he was acknowledged to be the rightful king]—1 L 134

The sword adventure of sir Galahad, at the age of 15, is thus given

The king and his knights came to the river and there found gold. "We go to seek the letters which said in this wise: 'Never shall man take me hence but only he by whom I ought to hang and he shall be the best knight of the world.' [Sir Galahad drew the sword easily, but no other knight was able to pull it forth]—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur, III 30 31 (1470)

A somewhat similar adventure occurs in the Amadis de Gaul. Whoever succeeded in drawing from a rock an enchanted sword, was to gain access to a subterranean treasure (ch עֲצָמִים, see also ch לְחָיִים, אֵימָה)

Sword (The Irresistible) The king of Araby and Ind sent Cambuscan' king of Tartary a sword that would pierce any armour, and if the smiter chose he could heal the wound again by striking it with the flat of the blade—Chaucer, The Squire's Tale (1388)

Sword and the Maiden (The) Soon after King Arthur succeeded to the throne, a damsel came to Camelot girded with a sword which no man defiled by "shame, treachery, or guile" could draw from its scabbard. She had been to the court of King Ryence, but no knight there could draw it. King Arthur tried to draw it, but with no better success, all his knights tried also, but none could draw it. At last a poor ragged knight named Balin, who had been held in prison for six months, made the attempt, and drew the sword with the utmost ease, but the knights insisted it had been done by witchcraft. The maiden asked Sir Balin to give her the sword, but he refused to do so, and she then told him it would bring death to himself and his dearest friend, and so it did, for when he and his brother Balan jousted together, unknown to each other, both were slain, and were buried in one tomb—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 27-44 (1470)

Sword in the City Arms (London) Stow asserts that the sword or dagger in the City arms was not added in commemoration of Walworth's attack on Wat Tyler, but that it represents the sword of St Paul, the patron saint of London. This is not correct. Without doubt the cognizance of the City, previous to 1381, was St Paul's sword, but after the death of Tyler it was changed into Walworth's dagger.

Sword of God (The) Khaled, the conqueror of Syria (632-8), was so called by Mohammedans.

Sword of Rome (The), Marcellus Fabius was called "The Shield of Rome" (time of Hannibal's invasion).

Swordsman (The Handsome) Jo-nelium Murt was called Le Beau Sabreur (1767-1815).

Sybaris, a river of Lucania, in Italy, whose waters had the virtue of restoring vigour to the feeble and exhausted—Pliny, Natural History, XXXI n 10

Syb'arite (3 syl), an effeminate man, a man of pampered self-indulgence. Seneca tells us of a sybarite who could not endure the nubble of a folded rose leaf in his bed.

[Her bed] softer than the soft sybarites, who cried
Aloud because his feelings were too tender
To brook a ruffled rose leaf by his side.

Byron Don Juan vi 89 (1824)

Syc'orax, a foul witch, the mistress of Ariel the fairy spirit, by whom for some offence he was imprisoned in the rift of a cloven pine tree. After he had been kept there for twelve years, he was liberated by Prospero, the rightful duke of Milan and father of Miranda. Sycorax was the mother of Caliban—Shakespeare, The Tempest (1609).

If you had told Sycorax that her son Caliban was as Those foul and impure mixts which their pens like the raven wings of Sycorax had brushed from fern and bog—

Sir W. Scott, The Drama

Syddall (Anthony), house-steward at Osbaldistone Hall—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Sydenham (Charles), the frank, open-hearted, trusty friend of the Woodvilles—Cumberland, The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Syl, a monster like a basilisk, with human face, but so terrible that no one could look on it and live.

Sylla (Corneilius), the rival of Marius. Being consul, he had ex-officio a right to lead in the Mithridatic war (n c 88), but Marius got the appointment of Sylla set aside in favour of himself. Sylla, in dudgeon, hastened back to Rome, and insisted that the "recall" should be reversed. Marius fled. Sylla pursued the war with success, returned to Rome in triumph, and made a wholesale slaughter of the Romans who had opposed him. As many as 7000 soldiers and 5000 private citizens fell in this massacre, and all their goods were distributed among his own partisans. Sylla was now called "Perpetual Dictator," but in two years retired into private life, and died the year following (n c 78).

Jouy has a good tragedy in French called Sylla (1822), and the character of "Sylla" was a favourite one with Talma, the French actor. In 1594 Thomas Lodge produced his historical play called

Words of Civil War, lively set forth in the Five Tragicomies of Marston and Sylla

Sylli (Signor), an Italian exquisite, who walks fantastically, talks affectedly, and thinks himself irresistible. He makes love to Camiola "the maid of honour," and fancies, by posturing, grimaces, and affectation, to "make her dote on him." He says to her, "In singing, I am a Siren," in dancing, a Terpsichore. "He could tune a ditty lovely well," and prided himself "on his pretty spider fingers, and the twinkling of his two eyes." Of course, Camiola sees no charms in these effeminate, but the conceited puppy says he "is not so sorry for himself as he is for her" that she rejects him. Signor Sylli is the silliest of all the Syllis — Messinger, The Maid of Honour (1637) (See TAPIRIT)

Sylvia, daughter of justice Balance, and an heiress. She is in love with captain Plume, but promised her father not to "dispose of herself to any man without his consent." As her father feared Plume was too much a libertine to make a steady husband, he sent Sylvia into the country to withdraw her from his society, but she dressed in her brother's military suit, assumed the name of Jack Wilsul alias Pinch, and enlisted. When the names were called over by the justices, and that of "Pinch" was brought forward, justice Balance "gave his consent for the recruit to dispose of [himself] to captain Plume," and the permission was kept to the letter, though not in its intent. However, the matter had gone too far to be revoked, and the father made up his mind to bear with grace what without disgrace he could not prevent — G. Tarquhar, The Recruiting Officer (1705)

I am troubled neither with spleen, cholic, nor vapours
I need no pills for my stomach, nor hart-horn for my head, nor wash for my complexion. I can gallop all the morning after the hunting horn, and all the evening after

Sylvio de Rosalva (Don), the hero and title of a novel by C. M. Wieland (1733-1813). Don Sylvio, a quixotic believer in fairyism, is gradually converted to common sense by the extravagant demands which are made on his belief, assisted by the charms of a mortal beauty. The object of this romance is a crusade against the sentimentalism and religious foolery of the period.

Symkyn (Symond), nicknamed "Disdainful," a miller, living at Trompington, near Cambridge. His face was round, his nose flat, and his skull "piled as an ape's." He was a thief of corn and meat, but stole craftily. His wife was the village parson's daughter, very proud and arrogant. He tried to outwit Aleyn and John, two Cambridge scholars, but was himself outwitted, and most roundly handled also — Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Reeve's Tale," 1388)

Symmes's Hole. Captain John Cleave Symmes maintained that there was, at 82° N. lat., an enormous opening through the crust of the earth into the globe. The place to which it led he asserted to be well stocked with animals and plants, and to be lighted by two under-ground planets named Pluto and Proserpine. Captain Symmes asked sir Humphrey Davy to accompany him in the exploration of this enormous "hole" (*-1829).

Halley the astronomer (1656-1742) and Holberg of Norway (1684-1754) believed in the existence of this hole.

Symonides the Good, king of Pentapolis — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Symplo'gados (4 syl), two rocks at the entrance of the Tuxine Sea. To navigators they sometimes look like one rock, and sometimes the light between shows they are two. Hence the ancient Greeks said that they opened and shut. Olivier says "they appear united or joined together according to the place whence they are viewed."

This amiable creature was about to marry May Fielding, when her old sweetheart Edward Plummer, thought to be dead, returned from South America, and married her. Tackleton was reformed by Peerybingle, the carrier, bore his disappointment manfully, sent the bride and bridegroom his own wedding-cake, and joined the festivities of the marriage banquet—C Dickens, The Cricket on the Hearth (1845)

Taffril (Lieutenant), of H M gun-brig Search. He is in love with Jenny Caxton the milliner—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Taffy, a Welshman. The word is simply Davy (David) pronounced with aspiration. David is the most common Welsh name, Sawney (Alexander), the most common Scotch, Pat (Patrick), the most common Irish, and John (John Bull), the most common English. So we have cousin Michael for a German, Micaire for a Frenchman, Colin Tampon for a Swiss, and brother Jonathan in the United States of North America.

Tag, wife of Puff, and lady's-maid to Miss Biddy Bellair—D Garrick, Miss in Her Teens (1753)

Tahmuras, a king of Persia, whose exploits in Furry-land among the peris and deers are fully set forth by Richardson in his Dissertation.

Tail made Woman (Man's). According to North American legend, God in anger cut off man's tail, and out of it made woman.

Tails (Men with). The Niam-niams, an African race between the gulf of Benin and Abyssinia, are said to have tails. Mons de Castelnau (1851) tells us that the Niam-niams "have tails forty centimetres long, and between two and three centimetres in diameter." Dr Hubsch, physician to the hospitals of Constantinople, says, in 1853, that he carefully examined a Niam-niam negress, and that her tail was two inches long. Mons d'Abbadie, in his Abyssinian Travels (1852), tells us that south of the Herra is a place where all the men have tails, but not the females. "I have examined," he says, "fifteen of them, and am positive that the tail is a natural appendage." Dr Wolf, in his Travels and Adventures, in (1861), says "There are both men and women in Abyssinia with tails like dogs and horses." He heard that, near Naren, in Abyssinia, there were men and women with tails so muscular that they could "knock down a horse with a blow."

John Struys, a Dutch traveller, says, in his Voyages (1650), that "all the natives on the south of Formosa have tails." He adds that he himself personally saw one of these islanders with a tail "more than a foot long."

It is said that the Ghilane race, which numbers between 30,000 and 40,000 souls, and dwell "far beyond the Senar," have tails three or four inches long. Colonel du Corret assures us that he himself most carefully examined one of this race named Bellal, a slave belonging to an emir in Mecca, whose house he frequented—World of Wonders, 206.

The Poonangs of Borneo are said to be a tail-bearing race.

Individual Examples. Dr Hubsch, referred to above, says that he examined at Constantinople the son of a physician whom he knew intimately, who had a decided tail, and so had his grandfather.

In the middle of the present (the nineteenth) century, all the newspapers made mention of the birth of a boy at Newcastle-on-Tyne with a tail, which "wagged when he was pleased."

In the College of Surgeons at Dublin may be seen a human skeleton with a tail seven inches long.

Tails given by way of Punishment. Polydore Vergil asserts that when Thomas a Becket came to Stroud, the mob cut off the tail of his horse, and in eternal reproach, "both they and their offspring bore tails." Lambirde repeats the same story in his Perambulation of Kent (1576).

For Becket's sake Kent always shall have tails.—Andrew Marvell.

John Bale, bishop of Ossory in the reign of Edward VI, tells us that John Capgrave and Alexander of Esseyby have stated it as a fact that certain Dorsetshire men cast fishes' tails at St Augustine, in consequence of which "the men of this county have borne tails ever since."

We all know the tradition that Cornish men are born with tails.

Taillefer, a valiant warrior and minstrel in the army of William the Conqueror. At the battle of Hastings (or Senlac) he stimulated the ardour of the Normans by songs in praise of Charlemagne and Roland. The soldier-minstrel was at last borne down by numbers, and fell fighting

Tailors (Nine) A toll of a bell is called a "teller," and at the death of a man the death bell used to be tolled thrice three times "Nine tellers mark a man" became perverted into "Nine tailors make a man" — Notes and Queries, March 4, 1877

Tailors of Tooley Street (The Threc) Canning tells us of three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, who addressed a petition of grievances to the House of Commons, beginning with these words, "We, the people of England"

The "deputies of Vaugirard" presented themselves before Charles VIII of France. When the king asked how many there were, the usher replied, "Only one, an please your majesty"

Taj, in Agra (East India), the mausoleum built by Shah Jehan to his favorite sultan, Moomtaz-i-Mahul, who died in childbirth of her eighth child. It is of white marble, and is so beautiful that it is called "A Poem in Marble," and "The Marble Queen of Sorrow"

Talbot (Colonel), an English officer, and one of Waverley's friends — Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Talbot (Lord Arthur), a cavalier who won the love of Elvira daughter of Lord Walton, but his lordship had promised his daughter in marriage to Sir Richard Ford, a puritan officer. The betrothal being set aside, Lord Talbot became the accepted lover, and the marriage ceremony was fixed to take place at Plymouth. In the mean time, Lord Arthur assisted the dowager queen Henrietta to escape, and on his return to England was arrested by the soldiers of Cromwell, and condemned to death, but Cromwell, feeling secure of his position, commanded all political prisoners to be released, so Lord Arthur was set at liberty, and married Elvira — Bellini, 1 Puritani (1834)

Talbot (Lymg Dic), the nickname given to Tyrconnel, the Irish Jacobite, who held the highest offices in Ireland in the reign of James II and in the early part of William III's reign (died 1691)

Tale of a Tub, a comedy by Ben Jonson (1618). This was the last comedy brought out by him on the stage, the first was Every Man in His Humour (1598)

Tales (Chinese), being the transmigrations of the mandarin Lum-Hoam, told to Gulchenraz daughter of the King of Georgia (See Fung-Hoam, p. 357) — T. S. Guculette (originally in French, 1723)

Tales (Fairy), a series of tales, originally in French, by the comtesse D'Aunoy, D'Aulnoy, or D'Anois (1698). Some are very near copies of the Arabian Nights. The best-known are "Cheri and Fair-star," "The Yellow Dwarf," and "The White Cat"

About the same time (1697), Claude Perrault published, in French, his famous Fairy Tales, chiefly taken from the Sagas of Scandinavia

Tales (Moral), twenty-three tales by Marmontel, originally in French (1761). They were intended for draughts of dramas. The design of the first tale, called "Alcibiades," is to expose the folly of expecting to be loved "merely for one's self." The design of the second tale, called "Soliman II," is to expose the folly of attempting to gain a woman's love by any other means than reciprocal love, and so on. The second tale has been dramatized.

Tales (Oraculi), by the comte de Caylus, originally in French (1713). A series of tales supposed to be told by Moraduk, a girl of 11 to Hudjadge shah of Persia, who could not sleep. It contains the tale of "The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus." (See MORADUK, p. 658.)

Tales of a Grandfather, in three parts, by Sir W. Scott, told to Hugh Littlejohn, who was between five and six years of age (1828). These tales are supposed to be taken from Scotch chronicles, and contain the most prominent and graphic incidents of Scotch history. Series I, to the annihilation of the two crowns in James I., series II, to the union of the two parliaments in the reign of Queen Anne, series III, to the death of Charles I. and the Young Pretender.

Tales of My Landlord, tales supposed to be told by the landlord of the Wallace Inn, in the parish of Ganderclough, "edited and arranged by Jededah Cleistbotham, schoolmaster and parish clerk" of the same parish, but in reality corrected and arranged by his usher, Peter or Patrick Pattison, who lived to complete five of the novels, but died before the last two were issued. These novels are arranged thus: First Series, "The Black Dwarf" and "Old Mortality," Second Series, "Heart of Midlothian," Third Series, "Bride of Lammermoor" and "Legend of Montrose," Posthumous, "Count Robert of Paris," and "Castle Dangerous."—Sir W. Scott (See Black Dwarf, introduction.)

Tales of the Crusaders, by Sir W. Scott, include The Betrothed and The Talisman.

Tales of the Genii, that is, tales told by genii to Iracengi their chief, respecting their tutelary charges, or how they had discharged their functions as the guardian genii of man. Patna and Conlor, children of Gualar (Gualar of Terli), were permitted to hear these accounts rendered, and hence they have reached our earth. The genius Brindann related the history of his tutelary charge of Abu'dali, a merchant of Bagdad. The genius Mumlouk told how he had been employed in watching over the dervise Alfouran. Next, Omphram recounted his labours as the tutelary genius of Hassan Ascar caliph of Bagdad. The genius Hassarick tells his experience in the tale of Kelaun and Guzzurat. The fifth was a female genius, by name Houadir, who told the tale of Urid, the fair wanderer, her ward on earth. Then rose the sage genius Macoma, and told the tale of the sultan Mizar, with the episodes of Mahond and the princess of Cassimir. The affable Adram, the tutelary genius of Sadal and Kalas'rade, told of their battle of life. Last of all rose the venerable genius Nadan, and recounted the history of his earthly charge named Mirghip the dervise. These tales, by James Ridley, 1765, are said to be from the Persian, and are ascribed to Horam son of Asmar.

Talbol, a butcher in Newgate market, who obtained a captain's commission in Cromwell's army for his bravery at Naseby.

Tal, all was of course about
And it to labour sweet, and toll
And it is a chain plain shing wi' bell.
He many a year - it his pen can
D. I. like and her Guy, o'er all row
Will it never true, it's sheep he I brought Than Ajax or his son, on Quitoate
S. Tal, r. Illustrations, I. 2 (1663).

Taliesin or Talliesin, son of St. Henwig, chief of the bards of the West, in the time of King Arthur (sixth century). In the Mabinogion is given the legends connected with him, several specimens of his songs, and all that is historically known about him. The bursting in of the sea through the neglect of Seithenin, who had charge of the embankment, and the ruin which it brought on Gwaddio Garanhir, is allegorized by the bursting of a pot called the "caldron of inspiration," through the neglect of Gwion Bach, who was set to watch it.

That Tallesin, once while he the rivers dance
And in his raptures raised the mountain, from their trance
Shall tremble at my verse.
Dryden Tales of the Talisman (1677).

Talisman (The), a novel by Sir W. Scott, and one of the best of the thirty-two which he wrote (1825). It is the story of Richard Cœur de Lion being cured of a fever in the Holy Land, by Saladin, the sultan, his noble enemy. Saladin, hearing of his illness, assumed the disguise of Adonbec el Hakim, the physician, and visited the king. He filled a cup with spring water, into which he dipped the talisman, a little red purse that he took from his bosom, and when it had been steeped long enough, he gave the draught to the king to drink (ch. ix.). During the king's sickness, the archduke of Austria planted his own banner beside that of England, but immediately Richard recovered from his fever, he tore down the Austrian banner, and gave it in custody to sir Kenneth. While Kenneth was absent, he left his dog in charge of it, but on his return, found the dog wounded and the banner stolen. King Richard, in his rage, ordered sir Kenneth to execution, but pardoned him on the intercession of "the physician" (Saladin). Sir Kenneth's dog showed such a strange aversion to the marquis de Montserrat that suspicion was aroused, the marquis was challenged to single combat, and, being overthrown by sir Kenneth, confessed that he had stolen the banner. The love story interwoven is that between sir Kenneth the prince royal of Scotland, and lady Edith Plantagenet the king's kinswoman, with whose marriage the tale concludes.

Talismans In order to free a house of vermin, the figure of the poisonous animal should be made in wax in "the planetary hour"—Warhurton, Critical Inquiry into Prodigious (1727)

He swore that you had robbed his house
And stolen his talismanic louse.

S Butler Hudibras III. 1 (1678)

The Abraxas stone, a stone with the word ABRAXAS engraved on it, is a famous talisman. The word symbolizes the 365 intelligences between deity and man.

In Arabia, a talisman, consisting of a piece of paper containing the names of the seven sleepers of Ephesus, is still used, "to ward the house from ghosts and demons."

Talismans (The Four) Houna, surnamed Seidel-Beckir, a talismanist, made three of great value: viz, a little golden fish, which would fetch out of the sea whatever it was bidden, a poniard, which rendered invisible not only the person bearing it, but all those he wished to be so, and a ring of steel, which enabled the wearer to read the secrets of men's hearts. The fourth talisman was a bracelet, which preserved the wearer from poison.—Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743)

Talking Bird (The), called Bulbul-he'zar. It had the power of human speech, and when it sang all the song-birds in the vicinity came and joined in concert. It was also oracular, and told the sultan the tale of his three children, and how they had been exposed by the sultana's two jealous sisters.—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale)

The talking bird is called "the little green bird" in "The Princess Fairstar," one of the Fairy Tales of the comtesse D'Aunoy (1682)

Tallboy (Old), forester of St Mary's Convent—Sir W Scott, Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Talleyrand This name, anciently written "Tailleran," was originally a sobriquet derived from the words taller les rangs ("cut through the ranks")

Talleyrand is generally credited with the mot "La parole a été donnée à l'homme pour l'aider à cacher sa pensée [or déguiser la pensée]," but they were spoken by comte de Montrond, "the most agreeable scoundrel in the court of Marie Antoinette"—Captain Gronow, Recollections and Anecdotes

Voltaire, sixty years previously, had said "Ils n'employent les paroles que pour déguiser leurs pensées"—Le Chapon et la Poularde

And Goldsmith, in 1759, when Talleyrand was about four years old, had published the sentence "The true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them"—The Bee, III

Talos, son of Perdix, sister of Dredalos, inventor of the saw, compasses, and other mechanical instruments. His uncle, jealous of him, threw him from the citadel of Athens, and he was changed into a partridge.

Talos, a man of brass, made by Hephaestus (I Vulcan). This wonderful automaton was given to Minos to patrol the island of Crete. It traversed the island thrice every day, and if a stranger came near, made itself red hot, and squeezed him to death.

Talus, an iron man, representing power or the executive of a state. He was Astræa's groom, whom the goddess gave to sir Artegal. This man of iron, "unmovable and resistless without end," "swift as a swallow, and as a lion strong," carried in his hand an iron flail, "with which he threshed out falsehood, and did truth unfold." When sir Artegal fell into the power of Radigund queen of the Amazons, Talus brought Britomart to the rescue.—Spenser, Faery Queen, v. 1 (1596)

Talut So the Mohammedans call Saul.

Verily God hath set Talut king over you. Samus said Verily God hath chosen him and hath caused him to increase in knowledge and stature.—Al Koran, II.

Talvi, a pseudonym of Mrs Robinson. It is simply the initials of her maiden name, Therese Albertine Louise von Iakob.

Tam o' Todshaw, a huntsman, near Charlie's Hope farm—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II).

Tam o' the Cowgate, the sobriquet of Sir Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch lawyer, who lived in the Cowgate, at Edinburgh (*-1568).

Tamburlaine the Great (or Timour Leng), the Tartar conqueror. In history called Tamerlane. He had only one hand and was lame (1336-1405). The hero and title of a tragedy by C Marlow (1587). Shakespeare (2 Henry IV act ii sc 4) makes Pistol quote a part of this turgid play.

Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia,
What I can ye draw but twenty miles a day,
And have so proud a chariot at your heels,
And such a coachman as great Tamburlaine!

(In the stage direction)

Enter Tamburlaine drawn in his chariot by Trebizon and Soria, with bits in their mouths reins in his left hand in his right a whip with which he scourgeth them.

N Rowe has a tragedy entitled Tamerlane (q v).

Tame (1 syl), a river which rises in the vale of Aylesbury, at the foot of the Chiltern, and hence called by Drayton "Chiltern's son". Chiltern's son marries Isis (Cotswold's heiress), whose son and heir is Thames. This allegory forms the subject of song vi of the Polyolbion, and is the most poetical of them all.

Tamer Tamed (The), a kind of sequel to Shakespeare's comedy The Taming of the Shrew. In the Tamer Tamed, Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked.—Beaumont and Fletcher (1647).

Tamerlane, emperor of Tartary, in Rowe's tragedy so called, is a noble, generous, high-minded prince, the very glass and fashion of all conquerors in his forgiveness of wrongs, and from whose example Christians may be taught their moral code. Tamerlane treats Bajazet, his captive, with truly godlike clemency, till the fierce sultan plots his assassination. Then longer forbearance would have been folly, and the Tartar had his untamed captive chained in a cage, like a wild beast.—N Rowe, Tam Tamed (1702).

It is said that Louis XIV was Rowes "Bajazet," and William III his "Tamerlane."

* * Tamerlane is a corruption of Timour Lengh ("Timour the lame"). He was one-handed and lame also. His name was used by the Persians in terror (See TAMBLAINE THE GREAT).

Taming of the Shrew (The), a comedy by Shakespeare (1593). The "shrew" is Katharina, elder daughter of Baptista of Padua, and she is tamed by the stronger mind of Petruchio into a most obedient and submissive wife.

This drama is founded on A pleasant conceited Historie, called The Taming of a Shrew. As it hath beene sundry times acted by the right honourable the Earle of Pembroke his servants, 1607. The induction is borrowed from Heuterus, Rerum Burgundiarum, iv, a translation of which into English, by F Grimstone, appeared in 1607. The same trick was played by Haroun-al-Raschid on the merchant Abou Hassan (Arabian Nights, "The Sleeper Awakened"), and by Philippe the Good of Burgundy. (See Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, II ii 4, see also The Frolicsome Duke or the Tinker's Good Fortune (a ballad), Percy).

Beaumont and Fletcher wrote a kind of sequel to this comedy, called The Tamer Tamed, in which Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked (1617).

The Honeymoon, a comedy by Tobin (1804), is a similar plot, but the shrew is tamed with far less display of obstreperous self-will.

Tamino and Pamina, the two lovers who were guided by the magic flute through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis)—Mozart, Die Zauberflöte (1791).

Tammany, an Indian chief, called in the United States St. Tammany, and adopted as the tutelary genius of one branch of the democratic party. The chief was of the Delaware nation, and lived in the seventeenth century. He was a great friend of the Whites, and often restrained the violence of his warriors against them. His great motto was, "Union. In peace for prosperity, in war for defence." It is said that he still appears at times, and discourse on political economy and social wisdom. St. Tammany's Day is May 1.

The American Anti-Slavery Society, Tammany, a corruption of Tammany, the name of the first G. J. J.

Tammany Ring, a cabal, a powerful organization of unprincipled officials, who grow rich by plundering the people. So called from Tammany Hall, the headquarters of the high officials of the United States. Their corrupt practices were exposed in 1871.

Tammuz, the month of July. St Jerome says the Hebrews and Syrians call the month of June "Tammuz."

Tam'ora, queen of the Goths, in love with Aaron the Moor — (?) Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus (1593).

* * The classic name is Andronicus, but Titus Andronicus is a purely fictitious character.

Tamper (Colonel), betrothed to Emily. On his return from Havannah, he wanted to ascertain if Emily loved him "for himself alone," so he pretended to have lost one leg and one eye. Emily was so shocked that the family doctor was sent for, who, amidst other gossip, told the young lady he had recently seen colonel Tamper, who was looking remarkably well, and had lost neither leg nor eye. Emily now perceived that a trick was being played, so she persuaded Mdlle Florval to assume the part of a rival lover, under the assumed name of captain Johnson. After the colonel had been thoroughly roasted, major Belford entered, recognized "captain Johnson" as his own affiancée, the colonel saw how the tables had been turned upon him, apologized, and all ended happily. — G. Colman, senior, The Deuce is in Him (1762).

Tamson (Peg), an old woman at Middlemas village. — Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.).

Tanaquill, wife of Tarquinius priscus of Rome. She was greatly venerated by the Romans, but Juvenal uses the name as the personification of an imperious woman with a strong independent will. In the Faery Queen, Spenser calls Gloriana (queen Elizabeth) "Tanaquill" (bk. 1 introduction, 1590).

Tancred, son of Endes and Emma. He was the greatest of all the Christian warriors except Rinaldo. His one fault was "woman's love," and that woman Corrada, a pagan (bk. 1). Tancred brought 800 horse to the allied crusaders under Godfrey of Bonillon. In a night combat, Tancred unwittingly slew Corrada, and lamented her death with great and bitter lamentation (bk. vii). Being wounded, he was tenderly nursed by Ermiona, who was in love with him (bk. vii). — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

* * Rossini has an opera entitled Tancredi (1813).

Tancred, prince of Otranto, one of the crusaders, probably the same as the one above — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Tancred (Count), the orphan son of Manfred, eldest grandson of Roger I of Sicily, and rightful heir to the throne. His father was murdered by William the Bad, and he himself was brought up by Siffre'di, lord high chancellor of Sicily. While only a count, he fell in love with Sigismunda, the chancellor's daughter, but when king Roger died, he left the throne to Tancred, provided he married Constantia, daughter of William the Bad, and thus united the rival lines. Tancred gave a tacit consent to this arrangement, intending all the time to obtain a dispensation from the pope, and marry the chancellor's daughter, but Sigismunda could not know his secret intentions, and, in a fit of irritation, married the earl Osmond. Now follows the catastrophe. Tancred sought in interview with Sigismunda, to justify his conduct, but Osmond challenged him to fight. Osmond fell, and stabbed Sigismunda when she ran to his succour. — Thomson, Tancred and Sigismunda (1745).

* * Thomson's tragedy is founded on the episode called "The Baneful Marriage," Gil Blas, iv. 4 (Lesage, 1724). In the prose tale, Tancred is called "Henriquez," and Sigismunda "Blanch."

Tancredi, the Italian form of Tancred (q v). The best of the early operas of Rossini (1813).

Tanner of Tamworth (The), the man who mistook Edward IV for a highwayman. After some little altercation, they changed horses, the king giving his hunter for the tanner's cob worth about four shillings, but as soon as the tanner mounted the king's horse, it threw him, and the tanner gladly paid down a sum of money to get his old cob back again. King Edward now blew his hunting-horn, and the courtiers gathered round him. "I hope [i. e. expect] I shall be hanged for this," cried the tanner, but the king, in merry pin, gave him the manor of Plumpton Park, with 500 marks a year. — Percy, Reliques, etc.

Tannhauser (Sir), called in German the Ritter Tannhauser, a Teutonic knight, who wins the love of Isolauri, a Mantuan lady. Hilario the philosopher often con-verses with the Ritter on supernatural subjects, and promises that Venus herself shall be his mistress, if he will summon up his courage to enter Venusberg. Tannhäuser starts on the mysterious journey, and Lisanna, hearing thereof, kills herself. At Venusberg the Ritter gives full swing to his pleasures, but in time returns to Mantua, and makes his confession to pope Urban. His holiness says to him, "Man, you can no more hope for absolution than this staff which I hold in my hand can be expected to bud." So Tannhäuser flees in despair from Rome, and returns to Venusberg. Meanwhile, the pope's staff actually does sprout, and Urban sends in all directions for the Ritter, but he is nowhere to be found.

Tieck, in his Phantasus (1812), introduces the story. Wagner (in 1815) brought out an operatic spectacle, called Tannhäuser. The companion of Tannhäuser was Eckhardt.

* * The tale of Tannhäuser is substantially the same as that of Thomas of Erceuldoun, also called "Thomas the Rhymer," who was so intimate with Fairy folk that he could foretell what events would come to pass. He was also a bard, and wrote the famous lay of Sir Tristram. The general belief is that the seer is not dead, but has been simply removed from the land of the living to Faery-land, whence occasionally he emerges, to busy himself with human affairs. Sir W. Scott has introduced the legend in Castle Dangerous, v (See ERCELDOUN, p. 298).

Taouism, the system of Taou, that invisible principle which pervades everything. Pope refers to this universal divine permeation in the well-known lines:—

Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Grows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent.

Essay on Monism (1733)

Tapestered Chamber (The), a tale by Sir W. Scott, laid in the reign of George III. There are but two characters introduced. General Browne goes on a visit to Lord Woodville, and sleeps in the "tapestered chamber," which is haunted. He sees the "lady in the Sack," describes her to Lord Woodville next morning, and recognizes her picture in the portrait gallery.

The back of this form was turned to me, and I could observe from _____ that of an old woman whose _____ gown which, I think ladies _____ of robe com- pitch loose _____ broad platts upon the neck and shoulders which fall down to the ground and terminate in a species of train.

Tapley (Mar!), an honest, light-hearted young man, whose ambition was "to come out jolly" under the most unfavourable circumstances. Greatly attached to Martin Chuzzlewit, he leaves his comfortable situation at the Blue Dragon to accompany him to America, and in "Eden" has ample opportunities of "being jolly" so far as wretchedness could make him so. On his return to England, he marries Mrs. Lupin, and thus becomes landlord of the Blue Dragon.—C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, in 1841, etc. (1813).

Charles [1811 of France] was the Mark Tapley of Kings, and bore himself with his usual "jollity" under this afflicting news. It was remarked of him that no one could lose a kingdom with greater gaiety.—Id. J. White.

Tappertit (Sim & Simon), the apprentice of Gabriel Varden, locksmith. He was just 20 in years, but 200 in conceit. An old-fashioned, thin-faced, sleek-haired, sharp-nosed, small-eyed little fellow was Mr. Sim Tappertit, about five feet high, but thoroughly convinced in his own mind that he was both good looking and above the middle size, in fact, rather tall than otherwise. His figure, which was slender, he was proud of, and with his legs, which in knee-breeches were perfect curiosities of littleness, he was enraptured. He had also a secret notion that the power of his eye was irresistible, and he believed that he could subdue the haughtiest beauty "by eyeing her." Of course, Mr. Tappertit had an ambitious soul, and admired his master's daughter Dolly. He was captain of the secret society of "Prentice Knights," whose object was "vengeance against their tyrant masters." After the Gordon riots, in which Tappertit took a leading part, he was found "burnt and bruised, with a gun-shot wound in his body, and both his legs crushed into shapeless ugliness." The cripple, by the locksmith's aid, turned shoe-black under an archway near the Horse Guards, thrived in his vocation, and married the widow of a rag-and-bone collector. While an apprentice, Miss Miggs, the "protestant" shrewish servant of Mrs. Varden, cast an eye of hope on "Simmun," but the conceited puppy pronounced her "decidedly scrappy," and disregarded the soft imperchement.—C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841). (See SYLLI.)

Taproba'na, the island of Ceylon.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Tapwell (Timothy), husband of into a large pond, and there the Tartaro drowned himself—Rev W Webster, Basque Legends, 1-4 (1876)

In one of the Basque legends, Tartaro is represented as a Polyphemos, whose one eye is bored out with spits made red hot by some seamen who had wandered inadvertently into his dwelling. Like Ulysses, the leader of these seamen made his escape by the aid of a ram, but with this difference—he did not, like Ulysses, cling to the ram's belly, but fastened the ram's bell round his neck and threw a sheep-skin over his shoulders. When Tartaro laid hold of the fugitive, the man escaped, leaving the sheep-skin in the giant's hand.

Tartlet (Tim), servant of Mrs. Pattypan, to whom also he is engaged to be married. He says, "I loves to see life, because ry, 'tis so agreeable"—James Cobb, The First Floor, v. 2 (1756-1818)

Tartuffe (2 syl), the chief character and title of a comedy by Molière (1664). Tartuffe is a religious hypocrite and impostor, who uses "religion" as the means of gaining money, covering deceit, and promoting self-indulgence. He is taken up by one Orgon, a man of property, who promises him his daughter in marriage, but his true character being exposed, he is not only turned out of the house, but is lodged in jail for felony.

Isaac Bickerstaff has adapted Molière's comedy to the English stage, under the title of The Hypocrite (1768). Tartuffe he calls "Dr Cantwell," and Orgon "Sir John Lambert." It is thought that "Tartuffe" is a caricature of Pere la Chaise, the confessor of Louis XIV., who was very fond of trifles (French, tartuffes), and that this suggested the name to the dramatist.

Tartuffe (Jan cr), William I the king of Prussia and emperor of Germany (1797-)

I write to you my dear Augusta
To say we've had a regular buster"
Ten thousand French men sent by law
Praise God from whom all blessings flow"
I unch (during the Franco-Prussian war)

Tartuffe of the Revolution J N Pacht is so called by Carlyle (1740-1828)

Swiss Pacht's sleek headed, frugal the wonder of his own ally for humility of mind. Sit there, Tartuffe, till wanted.—Carlyle Tasnar, an enchanter, who aided the rebel army arrayed against Misnar sultan of Delhi. A female slave undertook to kill the enchanter, and went with the sultan's sanction to carry out her promise. She presented herself to Tasnar and Ahubai, and presented papers which she said she had stolen. Tasnar, suspecting a trick, ordered her to be bow-strung, and then detected a dagger concealed about her person. Tasnar now put on the slave's dress, and, transformed into her likeness, went to the sultan's tent. The vizier commanded the supposed slave to prostrate "herself" before she approached the throne, and while prostrate he cut off "her" head. The king was angry, but the vizier replied, "This is not the slave, but the enchanter. Fearing this might occur, I gave the slave a pass-word, which this deceiver did not give, and was thus betrayed. So perish all the enemies of Mahomet and Misnar his vicegerent upon earth!"—Sir C Morell [J Ridley], Tales of the Genu, vi (1751)

Tasnim, a fountain in Mahomet's paradise, so called from its being conveyed to the very highest apartments of the celestial mansions.

They shall drink of pure wine and the water mixed therewith shall be of Tasnim, a fountain whereof those shall drink who approach near unto the divine presence.—41 Koran lvi

Tasso and Leonora. When Tasso the poet lived in the court of Alfonso II the reigning duke of Ferrara, he fell in love with Leonora d'Este (2 syl) the duke's sister, but "she saw it not or viewed with disdain" his passion, and the poet, moneyless, fled half mad to Naples. After an absence of two years, in which the poet was almost starved to death by extreme poverty, his friends, together with Leonora, induced the duke to receive him back, but no sooner did he reach Ferrara than Alfonso sent him to an asylum, and here he was kept for seven years, when he was liberated by the instigation of the pope, but died soon afterwards (1514-1596).

Taste, a farce by Foote (1753), to expose the imposition of picture-dealers and sellers of virtue generally.

Tasting Death. The rabbis say there are three drops of gall on the sword of death: one drop in the month and the man dies, from the second the pallor of death is suffused, from the third the carcase turns to dust.—Purchas, His Pilgrimage (1613)

Tatinus, a Greek who joined the crusaders with a force of 200 men armed with "crooked sabres" and bows. These Greeks, like the Parthians, were famous in retreat, but when a drought came they all sneaked off home —Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, xiii (1575)

Tatius (Achilles), the acolyte, an officer in the Varangian guard —Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Tatlanthe (3 syl), the favourite of Fadladimida (queen of Queerummania and wife of Chrononhotonthologos) She extols the warlike deeds of the king, supposing the queen will feel flattered by her praises, and Fadladimida exclaims, "Art mad, Tatlanthe? Your talk's distasteful. You are too pertly lavish in his praise!" She then guesses that the queen loves another, and says to herself, "I see that I must tack about," and happening to mention "the captive king," Fadladimida exclaims, "That's he! that's he! that's he! I'd die ten thousand deaths to set him free." Ultimately, the queen promises marriage to both the captive king and Rigdum-Punnidos "to make matters easy." Then, turning to her favourite, she says

And now Tatlanthe thou art all my care
Where shall I find thee such another pair?
The best no where, and a lone and wretched

II Carey Chrononhotonthologos (1734)

Tattle, a man who ruins characters by innendo, and so denies a scandal as to confirm it. He is a mixture of "lying, foppery, vanity, cowardice, bragging, licentiousness, and ugliness, but a professed beau" (act 1). Tattle is entrapped into marriage with Mrs Frail —Congreve, Love for Love (1695)

* * "Mrs Candour," in Sheridan's School for Scandal (1777), is a Tattle in petticoats

Tattycoram, a handsome girl, with lustrous dark hair and eyes, who dressed very neatly. She was taken from the Foundling Hospital (London) by Mr Meagles to wait upon his daughter. She was called in the hospital Harriet Beadle. Harriet was changed first to Tatty, then to Tatty, and Coram was added because the Foundling stands in Coram Street. She was most impulsively passionate, and when excited had no control over herself. Miss Wado enticed her away for a time, but afterwards she returned to her first friends —C Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Tavern of Europe (The) Paris was called by prince Bismark, Le Cabaret de l'Europe

Tawny (The) Alexandre Bonvicino the historian was called Il Moretto (1514-1564)

Tawny Coats, sumpners, apparitors, officers whose business it was to summon offenders to the courts ecclesiastical, attendants on bishops

The bishop of London met him attended on by a goodly company of gentlemen in tawny coats —Slow, Chronicles of England 822 (1561)

Taylor, "the water-poet" He wrote four score books, but never learnt "so much as the accidents" (1580-1654).

Taylor their better Charon lends an oar
Once Swan of Thames, the now he sings no more
I hope The Dunciad iii. 19 (1728)

Taylor (Dr Chevalier John) He called himself "Ophthalminator, Pontifical, Imperial, and Royal." He died 1767 Hogarth has introduced him in his famous picture "The Undertaker's Arms." He is one of the three figures atop, to the left hand of the spectator, the other two are Mrs Mapp and Dr Ward

Teacher of Germany (The), Philip Melancthon, the reformer (1497-1560)

Teachwell (Mrs), a pseudonym of lady Ellinor Fenn, wife of sir John Fenn, of East Dereham, Norfolk

Teague (1 syl), an Irish lad, taken into the service of colonel Careless, a royalist, whom he serves with exemplary fidelity. He is always blundering, and always brewing mischief, with the most innocent intentions. His bulls and blunders are amusing and characteristic —Sir Robert Howard, The Committee (1670), altered by T Knight into The Honest Thieves

Who has not a recollection of the incomparable Johnstone (Irish Johnstone) in "Teague," picturesquely draped in his blanket, and pouring forth his exquisite humour and mellifluous brogue in equal measure —Mrs. C. Mathews, Tea Table Talk

* * The anecdote of Munden, as "Obadiah," when Johnstone, as "Teague," poured a bottle of lamp oil down his throat instead of sherry-and-water, is one of the raciest ever told (See OBADIAH)

Tearless Battle (The), a battle fought B.C. 867, between the Lacedæmonians and the combined armies of the Arcadians and Argives (2 syl). Not one of the Spartans fell, so that, as Plutarch says, they called it "The Tearless Battle."

* * Not one was killed in the Abyssinian expedition under sir R. Napier (1867-8).

Tears—Amber The tears shed by the sisters of Phryton were converted into amber—Greek Table

According to Pliny (Natural History, xxxvii 2, 11), amber is a concretion of birds' tears, but the birds were the sisters of Melæger, who never ceased weeping for his untimely death

Tearsheet (Doll), a common courtesan—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV (1598)

Teazle (Sir Peter), a man who, in old age, married a country girl that proved extravagant, fond of pleasure, selfish, and vain. Sir Peter was for ever nagging at her for her inferior birth and rustic ways, but secretly loving her and admiring her naïveté. He says to Rowley, "I am the sweetest-tempered man alive, and hate a teasing temper, and so I tell her ladyship a hundred times a day"

No one could deliver such a dialogue as is found in Sir Peter Teazle with such point as T. King [1730-1805]. He excelled in a quiet, senescent manner of speech. There was an epigrammatic style in everything he uttered. His voice was musical, his action slow, his countenance benignant and yet firm.—Wolkins' Life of Sheridan (1817)

Lady Teazle, a lively, innocent, country maiden, who married Sir Peter, old enough to be her grandfather. Planted in London in the whirl of the season, she formed a liaison with Joseph Surface, but being saved from disgrace, repented and reformed—R. B. Sheridan, School for Scandal (1777)

On April 7 1797 Miss Farren about to marry the earl of Derby took her final leave of the stage in the character of Lady Teazle. Her concluding words were applicable in a very remarkable degree to herself. Let me request Lady Sneerwell that you will make my respects to the scandalous college of which you are a member and inform them that Lady Teazle licentiate begs leave to return the diploma they granted her as she now leaves off practice and kills characters no longer. A passionate burst of tears he revealed the sensibility of the speaker, while a stunning burst of applause followed from the audience and the curtain was drawn down upon the play for no more would be listened to.—Mrs. C. Matthews

Teeth Rigord, an historian of the thirteenth century, tells that when Chosroës the Persian carried away the true cross discovered by St. Helena, the number of teeth in the human race was reduced. Before that time Christians were furnished with thirty and in some cases with thirty-two teeth, but since then no human being has had more than twenty-three teeth—See Historiens de France, xviii

* * The normal number of teeth is thirty-two still. This "historic fact" is of a piece with that which ascribes to woman one rib more than to man (Gen 21, 22)

Teetotal. The origin of this word is ascribed to Richard (Dicky) Turner, who, in addressing a temperance meeting in September, 1833, reduplicated the word total to give it emphasis. "We not only want total abstinence, we want more, we want t-total abstinence." The novelty and force of the expression took the meeting by storm.

It is not correct to ascribe the word to Mr. Swindlehurst of Preston, who is erroneously said to have stuttered.

Byron Don Juan lib. 80 (The Isles of Greece "1820)

* * Probably Byron meant Simonides of Ceos. Horace (Carmina, ii 1, 38) speaks of "Cæmunera nemere," meaning Simonides, but Seios or Scio properly means Chios, one of the seven places which laid claim to Homer. Both Ceos and Chios are isles of Greece.

Tei'lo (St), a Welsh saint, who took an active part against the Pelagian heresy. When he died, three cities contended for his body, but happily the strife was ended by the multiplication of the dead body into three. St. Teilos Capgrave insists that the ipsissime body was possessed by Llandaff—English Martyrology

Teirtu's Harp, which played of itself, merely by being asked to do so, and when desired to cease playing did so—The Mabinogion ("Kilweh and Olwen," twelfth century)

St. Dunstan's harp discoursed most enchanting music without being struck by any player.

The harp of the giant, in the tale of Jack and the Bean-Stub, played of itself. In one of the old Welsh tales, the dwarf named Dewryn Fyehan stole from a giant a similar harp.

Telemachos, the only son of Ulysses and Penelope. When Ulysses had been absent from home nearly twenty years, Telemachos went to Pylos and Sparta to gain information about him. Nestor received him hospitably at Pylos, and sent him to Sparta, where Menelaos told him the prophecy of Proteus (2 syl.) concerning Ulysses. He then returned home, where he found his father, and assisted him in slaying the suitors.

Telemachos was accompanied in his voyage by the goddess of wisdom, under the form of Mentor, one of his father's friends (See TELEMAQUE) — Greek Fable

Télémaque (Les Aventures de), a French prose epic, in twenty-four books, by Fénelon (1699). The first six books contain the story of the hero's adventures told to Calypso, as Æneas told the story of the burning of Troy and his travels from Troy to Carthage to queen Dido. Telemaque says to the goddess that he started with Mentor from Ithaca in search of his father, who had been absent from home for nearly twenty years. He first went to inquire of old Nestor if he could give him any information on the subject, and Nestor told him to go to Sparta, and have an interview with Menelaos. On leaving Lacedæmonia, he got shipwrecked off the coast of Sicily, but was kindly entreated by king Acestes, who furnished him with a ship to take him home (bk 1). This ship fell into the hands of some Egyptians, he was parted from Mentor, and sent to feed sheep in Egypt. King Sesostrius, conceiving a high opinion of the young man, would have sent him home, but died, and Télémaque was incarcerated by his successor in a dungeon overlooking the sea (bk 11). After a time, he was released, and sent to Tyre. Here he would have been put to death by Pygmalion, had he not been rescued by Astarbê, the king's mistress (bk 11). Again he embarked, reached Cyprus, and sailed thence to Crete. In this passage he saw Amphitritê, the wife of the sea-god, in her magnificent chariot drawn by sea-horses (bk 14). On landing in Crete, he was told the tale of king Idomeneus (4 syl.), who made a vow if he reached home in safety after the siege of Troy, that he would offer in sacrifice the first living being that came to meet him. This happened to be his own son, but when Idomenus proceeded to do according to his vow, the Cretans were so indignant that they drove him from the island. Being without a ruler, the islanders asked Télémaque to be their king (bk 5). This he declined, but Mentor advised the Cretans to place the reins of government in the hands of Aristodemos. On leaving Crete, the vessel was again wrecked, and Télémaque with Mentor was cast on the island of Calypso (bk 6). Here the narrative closes, and the rest of the story gives the several adventures of Telemaque from this point till he reaches Ithaca. Calypso, having fallen in love with the young prince, tried to detain him in her island, and even burnt the ship which Mentor had built to carry them home, but Mentor, determined to quit the island, threw Télémaque from a crag into the sea, and then leaped in after him. They had now to swim for their lives, and they kept themselves afloat till they were picked up by some Tyrians (bk 7). The captain of the ship was very friendly to Télémaque, and promised to take him with his friend to Ithaca, but the pilot by mistake landed them on Salentum (bk 10). Here Télémaque, being told that his father was dead, determined to go down to the infernal regions to see him (bk 18). In hadês he was informed that Ulysses was still alive (bk 20). So he returned to the upper earth (bk 22), embarked again, and this time reached Ithaca, where he found his father, and Mentor left him.

Tell (Guglielmo or William), chief of the confederates of the forest cantons of Switzerland, and son-in-law of Walter Furst. Having refused to salute the Austrian cap which Gessler, the Austrian governor, had set up in the market-place of Altorf, he was condemned to shoot an apple from the head of his own son. He succeeded in this perilous task, but letting fall a concealed arrow, was asked by Gessler with what object he had secreted it. "To kill thee, tyrant," he replied, "if I had failed." The governor now ordered him to be carried in chains across the lake Lucerne to Küssnacht Castle, "there to be devoured alive by reptiles," but, a violent storm having arisen on the lake, he was unchained, that he might take the helm. Gessler was on board, and when the vessel neared the castle, Tell leapt ashore, gave the boat a push into the lake, and shot the governor. After this he liberated his country from the Austrian yoke (1307).

This story of William Tell is told of a host of persons. For example Egli, the brother of Wayland, was commanded by king Nidung to shoot an apple from the head of his son. Egli, like Tell, took two arrows, and being asked why, replied, as Tell did to Gessler, "To shoot thee, tyrant, if I fail in my task."

A similar story is told of Olaf and Eindridi, in Norway. King Olaf dared Eindridi to a trial of skill. An apple was placed on the head of Eindridi's son, and the king shooting at it grazed the boy's head, but the father carried off the apple clean. Eindridi had concealed an arrow to aim at the king, if the boy had been injured.

Another Norse tale is told of Hemingr and Harald son of Sigurd (1066). After various trials of skill, Harald told Hemingr to shoot a nut from the head of Bjorn, his young brother. In this he succeeded, not with an arrow, but with a spear.

A similar tale is related of Geyti, son of Aslak, and the same Harald. The place of trial was the Faroe Isles. In this case also it was a nut placed on the head of Bjorn.

Saxo Grammaticus tells nearly the same story of Toki, the Danish hero, and Harald, but in this trial of skill Toki killed Harald.—Danorum Regum Heroumque Historia (1511).

Reginald Scot says that Puncher shot a penny placed on his son's head, but made ready another arrow to slay the duke Remgrave who had set him the task (1584).

 It is said of Domitian, the Roman emperor, that if a boy held up his hands with the fingers spread, he could shoot eight arrows in succession through the spaces without touching one of the fingers.

William of Cloudeley, to show the king his skill in shooting, bound his eldest son to a stake, put an apple on his head, and, at the distance of 400 feet, cleft the apple in two without touching the boy.

I have a son is seven year old,
He is to me full dear
I will hym tie to a stake
And lay an apple upon his head
And go six score paces hym fro
And I myselfe with a broad arrow
Will cleve the apple in two.

Percy Reliques

Similar feats of skill are told of Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough.

In Altorf market-place, the spot is still pointed out where Tell shot the apple from his son's head, and a plaster statue stands where the patriot stood when he took his aim.

See Roman fire in Hampden's bosom well

 The legend of William Tell has furnished Florian with the subject of a novel in French (1788), A. M. Lemierre with his tragedy of Guillaume Tell (1766), Schiller with a tragedy in German, Wilhelm Tell (1804), Knowles with a tragedy in English, William Tell (1840), and Rossini with the opera of Guilherme Tell, in Italian (1829).

Macready's performance in Tell [Knowles's drama] is always first rate. No actor ever affected me more than Macready did in some scenes of that play (1793-1873).—S. Rogers.

Tellus's Son, Antæos son of Poseidon and Gaia, a giant wrestler of Libya, whose strength was irresistible so long as he touched his mother (earth). Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air, and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tingis, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man called "The Hill of Antæos," and said to be his tomb.

So some have feigned that Tellus' giant son
Drew many new-born lives from his dead mother;
Another roars as soon as one was done
And twenty lost, yet still remained another
For when he fell and kissed the barren heath
His parent straight inspired successful breath
And tho' he self was dead, yet run o'ned him from death, Phineas Fletcher The Purple Island ix. (1633)

 Similarly, Bernardo del Carpio lifted Orlando in his arms, and squeezed him to death, because his body was proof against any instrument of war.

Tem'ar, i.e. Tamerlane. The word occurs in Paradise Lost, vi. 889 (1665).

Tem'hia, king of the serpents, in the island of serpents. King Tem'hia was "a small yellow serpent, of a glowing colour," with the gift of human speech, like the serpent which tempted Eve.—Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("History of Abouteleb," 1743).

Tem'ora, in Ulster, the palace of the Caledonian kings in Ireland. The southern kingdom was that of the Firbolg or Belgæ from South Britain, whose seat of government was at Atha, in Connaught.

Tem'ora, the longest of the Ossianic prose-poems, in eight books. The subject is the dethronement of the kings of Connaught, and consolidation of the two Irish kingdoms in that of Ulster. It must be borne in mind that there were two colonies in Ireland—one the Firbolg or British Belgæ, settled in the south, whose king was called the "lord of Atha," from Atha, in Connaught, the seat of government, and the other the Cacl, from Caledonia, in Scotland, whose seat of government was Tem'ora, in Ulster. When Crothar was "lord of Atha," he wished to unite the two kingdoms, and with this view carried off Conluma, only child of the rival king, and married her. The Caledonians of Scotland interfered, and Conar the brother of Fingal was sent with an army against the usurper, conquered him, reduced the south to a tributary state, and restored in his own person the kingdom of Ulster. After a few years, Cormac II (a minor) became king of Ulster and over-lord of Connaught. The Fir-bolg seizing this opportunity of revolt, Cairbar "lord of Atha" threw off his subjection, and murdered the young king in his palace of Temora. Fingal interfered in behalf of the Caela, but no sooner had he landed in Ireland, than Cairbar invited Oscar (Fingal's grandson) to a banquet, picked a quarrel with him in the banquet hall, and both fell dead, each by the other's hand. On the death of Cairbar, Faldath became leader of the Fir-bolg, but was slain by Fillan son of Fingal. Fillan, in turn, was slain by Cathmor brother of Cairbar. Fingal now took the lead of his army in person, slew Cathmor, reduced the Fir-bolg to submission, and placed on the throne Ferad-Artho, the only surviving descendant of Conar (first of the kings of Ulster of Caledonian race).

Tempe (2 syl), a valley in Greece, between mount Olympus and mount Ossa. The word was employed by the Greek and Roman poets as a synonym for any valley noted for its cool shades, singing birds, and romantic scenery.

They would have thought, who heard the strain,
They saw in Tempe's vale her native maids,
Amidst the festal sounding shades
To some unwearied minstrel dancing.

Collins Ode to the Pastors (1746)

Tempest (The), a drama by Shakespeare (1609). Prospero and his daughter Miranda lived on a desert island, enchanted by Sycorax who was dead. The only other inhabitants were Caliban, the son of Sycorax, a strange misshapen thing like a gorilla, and Ariel a sprite, who had been imprisoned by Sycorax for twelve years in the rift of a pine tree, from which Prospero set him free. One day, Prospero saw a ship off the island, and raised a tempest to wreck it. By this means, his brother Antonio, prince Ferdinand, and the king of Naples were brought to the island. Now it must be known that Prospero was once duke of Milan, but his brother Antonio, aided by the king of Naples, had usurped the throne, and set Prospero and Miranda adrift in a small boat, which was wind-driven to this desert island. Ferdinand (son of the king of Naples) and Miranda fell in love with each other, and the rest of the shipwrecked party being brought together by Ariel, Antonio asked forgiveness of his brother, Prospero was restored to his dukedom, and the whole party was conducted by Ariel with prosperous breezes back to Italy.

* * Dryden has a drama called The Tempest (1668).

Tempest (The), a sobriquet of marshal Junot, one of Napoleon's generals, noted for his martial impetuosity (1771-1818).

Tempest (The Hon Mr), late governor of Senegambia. He was the son of lord Hurrienne, impatient, irascible, headstrong, and poor. He says he never was in smooth water since he was born, for being only a younger son, his father gave him no education, taught him nothing, and then buffeted him for being a dunce.

First I was turned into the army there I got broken bones and empty pockets. Then I was banished to the coast of Africa, to govern the savages of Senegambia.—
Act II. 1

Miss Emily [Tempest], daughter of Mr Tempest, a great wit of very lively parts. Her father wanted her to marry sir David Daw, a great lout with plenty of money, but she fixed her heart on captain Henry Woodville, the son of a man ruined by gambling. The prospect was not cheering, but Penruddock came forward, and by making them rich, made them happy.—Cumberland, The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Tempest (Lady Betty), a lady with beauty, fortune, and family, whose head was turned by plays and romances. She fancied a plain man no better than a fool, and resolved to marry only a gay, fashionable, dashing young spark. Having rejected many offers because the suitor did not come up to her ideal, she was gradually left in the cold. Now she is company only for aunts and cousins, in ball-rooms is a wallflower, and in society generally is esteemed a piece of fashionable lumber.—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, xxviii (1759).

Templars (Knights), an order of knighthood founded in 1118 for the defence of the Temple in Jerusalem. Dissolved in 1312, and their lands, etc., transferred to the Hospitallers. They wore a white robe with a red cross, but the Hospitallers a black robe with a white cross.

Temple (The). When Solomon was dying, he prayed that he might remain standing till the Temple was completely finished. The prayer was granted, and he remained leaning on his staff till the Temple was finished, when the staff was gnawed through by a worm, and the dead body fell to the ground — Charles White, The Cashmere Shawl

Ten Animals in Paradise (The)
According to Mohammedan belief, ten animals, besides man, are admitted into heaven: (1) Kratim, Ketmir, or Catuier, the dog of the seven sleepers, (2) Balaam's ass, (3) Solomon's ant, (4) Jonah's whale, (5) the calf [sic] offered to Jehovah by Abraham in lieu of Isaac, (6) the ox of Moses, (7) the camel of the prophet Saleh or Salih, (8) the cuckoo of Belkis, (9) Ismael's ram, and (10) Al Borak, the animal which conveyed Mahomet to heaven.

There is diversity in some lists of the ten animals. Some substitute for Balaam's ass the ass of Aazis, Balis, or Maqueda, queen of Sheba, who went to visit Solomon. And some, but these can hardly be Mohammedans, think the ass on which Christ rode to Jerusalem should not be forgotten. But none seem inclined to increase the number.

Ten Commandments (A Woman's), the two hands with which she scratches the faces of those who offend her.

Could I come near your beauty with my nails,

Tenantius, the father of Cymbeline and nephew of Cassibela. He was the younger son of Lud king of the southern part of Britain. On the death of Lud, his younger brother Cassibela succeeded, and on the death of Cassibela the crown came to Tenantius, who refused to pay the tribute to Rome exacted from Cassibela on his defeat by Julius Cæsar.

Tendo Achilles, a strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. So called because it was the only vulnerable part of Achilles. The tale is that Thetis held him by the heel when she dipped him in the Styx, in consequence of which the water did not wet the child's heel. The story is post-Homeric.

Tenglio, a river of Lapland, on the banks of which roses grow.

Tereus [Tē' ruse], king of Daulis, and the husband of Proenē. Wishing afterwards to marry Philomela, her sister, he told her that Proenē was dead. He lived with his new wife for a time, and then cut out her tongue, lest she should expose his falsehood to Proenē, but it was of no use, for Philomela made known her story in the embroidery of a peplus. Tereus, finding his home too hot for his wickedness, rushed after Proenē with an axe, but the whole party was metamorphosed into birds. Tereus was changed into a hoopoe (some say a lapwing, and others an owl), Proenē into a swallow, and Philomela into a nightingale.

So was that tyrant Tereus nasty lust
Changed into Upupa's foul feeding dust.
Lord Brooke Declination of Monarchy.

* * Those who have read Titus Andronicus (usually bound up with Shakespeare's plays) will call to mind the story of Lavinia, defiled by the sons of Tamora, who afterwards plucked out her tongue and cut off her hands, but she told her tale by guiding a staff with her mouth and stumps, and writing it in the sand.

Fair Philomela, she but lost her tongue
And in a tedious sampler sewed her mind.
But lovely niece that mean is cut from thee,
A craftier Tereus' cousin hast thou met,
And he hath cut those pretty fingers off
That could have better sewed than Philomel.
Act II. sc. 4 (1533).

Ter'il (Sir Walter) The king exacts an oath from sir Walter to send his bride Cælestina to court on her wedding night. Her father, to save her honour, gives her a mixture supposed to be poison, but in reality only a sleeping draught, from which she awakes in due time, to the amusement of the king and delight of her husband — Thomas Dekker, Satirico-mastix (1602)

Termagant, an imaginary being, supposed by the crusaders to be a Mohammedan deity. In the Old Moralities, the degree of rant was the measure of the wickedness of the character portrayed, so Pontius Pilate, Judas Iscariot, Termagant, the tyrant, Sin, and so on, were all ranting parts. Painters expressed degrees of wickedness by degrees of shade.

I would have such a fellow whipp'd for oerdoing Termagant. — Shakespeare Hamlet act III. sc. 2 (1596)

Ternotte, one of the domestics of lady Eveline Berenger "the betrothed" — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Terpin (Sir), a king who fell into the power of Radigund, queen of the Amazons. Refusing to dress in female attire, as she commanded, and to sew, card wool, spin, and do house work, he was doomed to be gibbeted by her women. Sir Artegal undertook his cause, and a fight ensued, which lasted all day. When daylight closed, Radigund proposed to defer the contest till the following day, to which sir Artegal acceded. Next day, the knight was victorious, but when he saw the brave queen bleeding to death, he took pity on her, and, throwing his sword aside, ran to succour her. Up started Radigund as he approached, attacked him like a fury, and, as he had no sword, he was, of course, obliged to yield. So the contest was decided against him, and sir Terpin was hung by women, as Radigund had commanded — Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 5 (1596)

The "Thrashers" of Connanght, the "Carders," the followers of "captain Right" in the eighteenth century, those of "captain Rock" who appeared in 1822, and the "Fenians" in 1865, were similar disturbers of the peace. The watchword of the turbulent Irish, some ten years later, was "Home Rule."

Tesoretto, an Italian poem by Brunetto preceptor of Dante (1285). The poet says he was returning from an embassy to the king of Spain, and met a scholar on a bay mule, who told him of the overthrow of the Guelph. Struck with grief, he lost his road, and wandered into a wood, where Dame Nature accosted him, and disclosed to him the secrets of her works. On he wandered till he came to a vast plain, inhabited by Virtue and her four daughters, together with Courtesy, Bounty, Loyalty, and Prowess. Leaving this, he came to a fertile valley, which was for ever shifting its appearance, from round to square, from light to darkness. This was the valley of Queen Pleasure, who was attended by Love, Hope, Fear, and Desire. Ovid comes to Tesoretto at length, and tells him how to effect his escape.

Thais'a, daughter of Simon'idēs king of Pentapolis She married Pericles prince of Tyre In her voyage to Tyre, Thais'a gave birth to a daughter, and dying, as it was supposed, in childbirth, was cast into the sea The eldest in which she was placed drifted to Ephesus, and fell into the hands of Cerimien, a physician, who soon discovered that she was not dead Under proper care, she entirely recovered, and became a priestess in the temple of Diana Pericles, with his daughter and her betrothed husband, visiting the shrine of Diana, became known to each other, and the whole mystery was cleared up—Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Thal'aba ebn Hateb, a poor man, who came to Mahomet, requesting him to beg God to bestow on him wealth, and promising to employ it in works of godliness The "prophet" made the petition, and Thalaba rapidly grew rich One day, Mahomet sent to the rich man for alms, but Thalaba told the messengers their demand savoured more of tribute than of charity, and refused to give anything, but afterwards repenting, he took to the "prophet" a good round sum Mahomet now refused to accept it, and, throwing dust on the ungrateful churl, exclaimed, "Thus shall thy wealth be scattered!" and the man became poor again as fast as he had grown rich—Al Korán, ix (Sale's notes)

Thal'aba the Destroyer—that is, the destroyer of the evil spirits of Dom-Daniel. He was the only surviving child of Hodeir'rah (3 syl) and his wife Zai'nab (2 syl), their other eight children had been cut off by the Dom-Danielists, because it had been decreed by fate that "one of the race would be their destruction" When a mere stripling, Thal'aba was left motherless and fatherless (bk i), he then found a home in the tent of a Bedouin named Mo'ath, who had a daughter One'za (3 syl) Here he was found by Abdaldar, an evil spirit sent from Dom-Daniel to kill him, but the spirit was killed by a simoom just as he was about to stab the boy, and Thal'aba was saved (bk ii) He now drew from the finger of Abdaldar the magic ring, which gave him power over all spirits, and, thus armed, he set out "to avenge the death of his father" (bk iii) On his way to Babylon, he was encountered by a merchant, who was in reality the sorcerer Ibra'ha in disguise This sorcerer led Thalaba astray into the wilderness, and then raised up a whirlwind to destroy him, but the whirlwind was the death of Ibra'ha himself, and again Thalaba escaped (bk iv) He reached Babylon at length, and met there Mohareb, another evil spirit, disguised as a warrior, who conducted him to the "mouth of hell" Thalaba detected the villainy, and hurled the false one into the abyss (bk v) The young "Destroyer" was next conveyed to "the paradise of pleasure," but he resisted every temptation, and took to flight just in time to save One'za, who had been brought there by violence (bk vi) He then killed Alea'din, the presiding spirit of the garden, with a club, was made vizier, and married One'za, but she died on the bridal night (bk vii) Distracted at this calamity, he wandered towards Kâf, and entered the house of an old woman, who was spinning thread Thalaba expressed surprise at its extreme fineness, but Mamun'na (the old woman) told him, fine as it was, he could not break it Thalaba felt incredulous, and wound it round his wrists, when, lo! he became utterly powerless, and Mamun'na, calling up her sister Khwala, conveyed him helpless to the island of Mohareb (bk viii) Here he remained for a time, and was at length liberated by Mamuna, who repented of her sins, and turned to Allah (bk ix) Being liberated from the island of Mohareb, our hero wandered, cold and hungry, into a dwelling, where he saw Laila, the daughter of Okba the sorcerer Okba rushed fer-

ward with intent to kill him, but Laila interposed, and fell dead by the hand of her own father (bk xi). Her spirit, in the form of a green bird, now became the guardian angel of "The Destroyer," and conducted him to the ruin, who directed him the road to Dom-Daniel (bk xi), which he reached in time, slew the surviving sorcerers, and was received into heaven (bk xi) — Southey, The Destroyer (1797)

Thanemar, chateau of Bourbourg, the great enemy of Bertulphie the provost of Bruges Charles "the Good," earl of

By these absurd laws, the provost of Bruges became a serf, because his father was Thanemar's serf By the same laws, Bouchard, though a knight of long descent, became Thanemar's serf, because he married Constance the provost's daughter The result of these laws was that Bertulphie slew the earl and then him-

He arranged a disputation with that prince, to be carried on solely by pantomime, without the utterance of a single word. Panurge undertook the disputation for the prince, and Pantagruel was appointed arbiter. Many a knotty point in magic, alchemy, thecchala, geomancy, astrology, and philosophy was argued out by signs alone, and the Englishman freely confessed himself fully satisfied, for "Panurge had told him even more than he had asked"—Rabelais, Pantagruel, u 19, 20 (1533)

Thaumaturga. Filumena is called La Thaumaturge du Dixneuvième Siècle. In 1802 a grave was discovered with this inscription LUMENA PAUTE CUMI, which has no meaning, but being re-arranged makes PUTE-CUM, FI-LUMENA. So Filumena was at once accepted as a proper name and canonized. And because as many miracles were performed at her tomb as at that of the famous abbé de Paris mentioned in Paley's Evidences, she was called "The Nineteenth-Century Miracle-Worker." But who Filumena was, or if indeed she ever existed, is one of those impenetrable secrets which no one will ever know (See ST FILUMENA, p 859)

Theagenes and Charicleia (The Loves of), a love story, in Greek, by Heliodorus bishop of Trikka (fourth century). A charming fiction, largely borrowed from by subsequent novelists, and especially by Mlle de Scudéri, Tasso, Guarini, and D'Urfé. The tale is this. Some Egyptian brigands met one morning on a hill near the mouth of the Nile, and saw a vessel laden with stores lying at anchor. They also observed that the banks of the Nile were strewn with dead bodies and the fragments of food. On further examination, they beheld Charicleia sitting on a rock tending Theagènes, who lay beside her severely wounded. Some pirates had done it, and to them the vessel belonged. We are then carried to the house of Nausioclès, and there Calasiris tells the early history of Charicleia, her love for Theagenès, and their capture by the pirates, Thebaid (The), a Latin epic poem in twelve books, by Statius (about a century after Virgil) Laios, king of Thebes, was told by an oracle that he would have a son, but that his son would be his murderer. To prevent this, when the son was born he was hung on a tree by his feet, to be devoured by wild beasts. The child, however, was rescued by some of the royal servants, who brought him up, and called his name Oedipos or Club-foot, because his feet and ankles were swollen by the thongs. One day, going to Thebes, the chariot of Laios nearly drove over the young Oedipos, a quarrel ensued, and Laios was killed. Oedipos, not knowing whom he had slain, went on to Thebes, and ere long married the widowed queen Jocasta, not knowing that she was his mother, and by her he had two sons and two daughters. The names of the sons were Eteocles and Polynices. These sons, in time, dethroned their father, and agreed to reign alternate years. Eteocles reigned first, but at the close of the year refused to resign the crown to his brother, and Polynices made war upon him. This war, which occurred some forty-two years before the siege of Troy, and about the time that Deborah was fighting with Sisera (Judges iv), is the subject of the Thebaid.

The first book recapitulates the history given above, and then goes on to say that Polynices went straight to Argos, and laid his grievance before king Adrastus (bk i). While at Argos, he married one of the king's daughters, and Tydeus the other. The festivities being over, Tydeus was sent to Thebes to claim the throne for his brother-in-law, and being insolently dismissed, denounced war against Eteocles. The villainous usurper sent fifty ruffians to fall on the ambassador on his way to Argos, but they were all slain, except one, who was left to carry back the news (bk ii). When Tydeus reached Argos, he wanted his father-in-law to march at once against Thebes, but Adrastus, less impetuous, made answer that a great war required time for its organization. However, Kapaneus (8 syl), siding with Tydeus [his duce], roused the mob (bk iii), and Adrastus at once set about preparations for war. He placed his army under six chieftains, viz., Polynices, Tydeus, Amphiaraios, Kapaneus, Parthenopæos, and Hippomedon, he himself acting as commander-in-chief (bk iv). Bks v, vi describe the march from Argos to Thebes. On the arrival of the allied army before Thebes, Jocasta tried to reconcile her two sons, but not succeeding in this, hostilities commenced, and one of the chiefs, named Amphiaraios, was swallowed up by an earthquake (bk vii). Next day, Tydeus greatly distinguished himself, but fell (bk viii). Hippomedon and Parthenopæos were both slain the day following (bk ix). Then came the turn of Kapaneus, bold as a tiger, strong as a giant, and a regular dare-devil in war. He actually scaled the wall, he thought himself sure of victory, he defied even Jove to stop him, and was instantly killed by a flash of lightning (bk x). Polynices was now the only one of the six remaining, and he sent to Eteocles to meet him in single combat. The two brothers met, they fought like lions, they gave no quarter, they took no rest. At length, Eteocles fell, and Polynices, running up to strap him of his arms, was thrust through the bowels, and fell dead on the dead body of his brother. Adrastus now decamped, and returned to Argos (bk xi). Creon, having usurped the Theban crown, forbade any one on pain of death to bury the dead, but when Theseus king of Athens heard of this profanity, he marched at once to Thebes, Creon died, and the crown was given to Theseus (bk xii).

Thenot, an old shepherd bent with age, who tells Cuddy, the herdsman's boy, the fable of the oak and the briar. An aged oak, once a most royal tree, was wasted by age of its foliage, and stood with bare head and scar branches. A pert bramble grew hard by, and snubbed the oak, calling it a cumberer of the ground. It even complained to the lord of the field, and pryed him to cut it down. The request was obeyed, and the oak was felled, but now the bramble suffered from the storm and cold, for it had no shelter, and the snow bent it to the ground, where it was dragged and defiled. The application is very personal. Cuddy is the pert, suppliant bramble, and Thenot the hoary oak, but Cuddy told the old man his tale was long and trashy, and bade him hie home, for the sun was set—Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, ii (1579).

(Thenot is introduced also in eel iv, and again in eel xi, where he begs Colin to sing something, but Colin declines because his mind is sorrowing for the death of the shepherdess Dido.)

The'not, a shepherd who loved Corin chiefly for her "fidelity" to her deceased lover. * * In mediæval times, no one with any personal defect was allowed to reign, and one of the most ordinary means of disqualifying a prince for succeeding to a throne was to put out his eyes. Theodore, son of the lord of Clarnasil, and grandson of Alphonso. His father thought him dead, renounced the world, and became a monk of St. Nicholas, assuming the name of Austin. By chance, Theodore was sent home in a Spanish bark, and found his way into some secret passage of the count's castle, where he was seized and taken before the count. Here he met the monk Austin, and was made known to him. He informed his father of his love for Adelaide, the count's daughter, and was then told that if he married her he must renounce his estates and title. The case stood thus: If he claimed his estates, he must challenge the count to mortal combat, and renounce the daughter, but if he married Adelaide, he must forego his rights, for he could not marry the daughter and slay his father-in-law. The perplexity is solved by the death of Adelaide, killed by her father by mistake, and the death of the count by his own hand.—Robert Jephson, Count of Narbonne (1782)

Theringo (M'de de), the mother of Louise de Lascours, and grandmother of Diana de Lascours and Marlin alias Orgarita "the orphan of the Frozen Sea"—T. Stirling, The Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856)

Thermopylæ. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Leonidas was sent with 300 Spartans, as a forlorn hope, to defend the pass leading from Thessaly into Locris, by which it was thought the Persian host would penetrate into southern Greece. The Persians, however, having discovered a path over the mountains, fell on Leonidas in the rear, and the "brave defenders of the hot-gates" were cut to pieces.

Theron, the favourite dog of Roderick the last Gothic king of Spain. When the discredited king, dressed as a monk, assumed the name of "father Maceabee," although his tutor, mother, and even Florinda failed to recognize him, Theron knew him at once, frowned on him with fondest love, and would never again leave him till the faithful creature died. When Roderick saw his favourite,

He threw his arms around the dog, and cried
While tears streamed down Thou Theron thou hast known
Thy poor lost master Theron none but thou!
Soutley Roderick, etc. xv (1814)

Thersites (3 syl), a scurrilous Grecian chief, "loquacious, loud, and coarse." His chief delight was to inveigh against the kings of Greece. He squinted, halted, was gibbous behind and pinched before, and on his tapering head grew a few white patches of starveling down (Iliad, ii.)

His brow, as Thersites with elbows abroad,
T'usser Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry liv (1557)

The'seus (2 syl), the Attic hero. He induced the several towns of Attica to give up their separate governments and submit to a common jurisdiction, whereby the several petty chiefdoms were consolidated into one state, of which Athens was the capital.

 Similarly, the several kingdoms of the Saxon heptarchy were consolidated into one kingdom by Egbert, but in this latter case, the might of arms, and not the power of conviction, was the instrument employed.

Theseus (Duke) of Athens. On his return home after marrying Hypolita, a crowd of female suppliants complained to him of Creon king of Thebes. The duke therefore set out for Thebes, slew Creon, and took the city by assault. Among the captives taken in this siege were two knights, named Palamon and Arcite, who saw the duke's sister from their dungeon window, and fell in love with her. When set at liberty, they told their loves to the duke, and Theseus (2 syl) promised to give the lady to the best man in a single combat. Arcite overthrew Palamon, but as he was about to claim the lady his horse threw him, and he died, so Palamon lost the contest, but won the bride—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1888).

 In classic story, Theseus is called "king," but Chaucer styles him "duke," that is, dux, "leader or emperor" (imperator).

Thes'pian Maids (The), the nine Muses. So called from Thes'pia, in Boeotia, near mount Helicon, often called Thespia Rupes.

Those modest Thesplan maids thus to their Isis sung
Dryden Polyolbon, xv (1613)

Thespi'o, a Muse. The Muses were called Thespi'ads, from Thes'pia, in Boeotia, at the foot of mount Helicon.

Thet'is, mother of Achill's. She was a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus the sea-god—Grecian Story.

Theuerdank, a sobriquet of kaiser Maximilian I of Germany (1459, 1493-1519).

Thiebalt, a Provençal, one of Arthur's escorts to Aix—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Thieves (The Two). The penitent thief crucified with Jesus has been called by sundry names, as Demas, Dismas, Titus, Mattha, and Vicinus.

The impenitent thief has been called Gestas, Dumachus, Joca, and Justins.

In the Apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus the former is called Dysmas and the latter Gestas. In the Story of Joseph of Arimathea the former is called Demas and the latter Gestas. Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, calls them Titus and Dumachus. He says that they attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let the good people go," but Dumachus refused to do so till he "paid a ransom for himself and family." Upon this, Titus gave his fellow forty groats, and the infant Jesus said, "In thirty years I shall die, and you two with Me. We shall be crucified together, but in that day, Titus, this deed shall be remembered."

Thieves (His ancestors proved). It is Sir Walter Scott who wrote and proved his "ancestors were thieves," in the Lay of the Last Minstrel, iv 9.

A modern author spends a hundred leaves
To prove his ancestors notorious thieves.
The Town Eclogue

Thieves Screened. It is said of Edward the Confessor that one day, while lying on his bed for his afternoon's nap, a courtier stole into his chamber, and, seeing the king's casket, helped himself freely from it. He returned a second time, and on his third entrance, Edward said, "Be quick, or Hugoline (the chamberlain) will see you." The courtier was scarcely gone, when the chamberlain entered and instantly detected the theft. The king said, "Never mind, Hugoline, the fellow who has taken it no doubt has greater need of it than either you or I" (Reigned 1042-1066)

Several similar anecdotes are told of Robert the Pious, of France. At one time he saw a man steal a silver candlestick off the altar, and said, "Friend Ogger, run for your life, or you will be found out." At another time, one of the twelve poor men in his train cut off a rich gold pendant from the royal robe, and Robert, turning to the man, said to him, "Hide it quickly, friend, before any one sees it" (Reigned 996-1031)

The following is told of two or three kings, amongst others of Ludwig the Pious, who had a very overbearing wife. A beggar under the table, picking up the crumbs which the king let down, cut off the gold fringe of the royal robe, and the king whispered to him, "Take care the queen doesn't see you."

Thieves of Historic Note

AUTOLYCOS, son of Hermès, a very prince of thieves. He had the power of changing the colour and shape of stolen goods, so as to prevent their being recognized.—Greek Fable

BARLOW (Jimmy), immortalized by the ballad-song

My name it is Jimmy Barlow
I was born in the town of Carlow
And here I lie in Maryboro' Jail
All for the robbing of the Dublin mail

CARTOUCHE, the Dick Turpin of France (eighteenth century)

COTTINGTON (John), in the time of the Commonwealth, who emptied the pockets of Oliver Cromwell when lord protector, stripped Charles II. of £1500, and stole a watch and chain from lady Fairfax.

DUVAL (Claude), a French highwayman, noted for his gallantry and daring (*-1670) (See below, "James Whitney," who was a very similar character)

* * Alexander Dumas has a novel entitled Claude Duval, and Miss Robinson has introduced him in White Priars.

FRITH (Mary), usually called "Moll Cutpurse." She had the honour of robbing general Fairfax on Honnslow Heath. Mary Frith lived in the reign of Charles I, and died at the age of 75 years.

* * Nathaniel Field has introduced Mary Frith, and made merry with some of her pranks, in his comedy Amends for Ladies (1618)

GALLOPING DICK, executed in Aylesbury in 1800

GRANT (Captain), the Irish highwayman, executed at Maryborough in 1816

GREENWOOD (Samuel), executed at Old Bailey in 1822.

HASSAN, the "Old Man of the Mountain," once the terror of Europe. He was chief of the Assassins (1056-1124)

HOOD (Robin) and his "merry men all," of Sherwood Forest. Famed in song, drama, and romance. Probably he lived in the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion.

* * Sir W. Scott has introduced him both in The Talisman and in Ivanhoe. Stow has recorded the chief incidents of his life (see under the year 1213). Ritson has compiled a volume of ballads respecting him. Drayton has given a sketch of him in the Polyolbion, &c. The following are dramas on the same outlaw, viz.—The Playe of Robyn Hode, very proper to be played in Maye games (fifteenth century), Skelton, at the command of Henry VIII, wrote a drama called The Downfall of Robert Earl of Huntington (about 1520), The Downfall of Robert Earl of Huntington, by Munday (1597), The Death of Robert Earle of Huntington, otherwise called Robin Hood of Merrie Sherwodde, by H. Chettle (1598). Chettle's drama is in reality a continuation of Munday's, like the two parts of Shakespeare's plays, Henry IV. and Henry V. Robin Hood's Pennorths, a play by Wm. Haughton (1600), Robin Hood and His Pastoral May Games (1624), Robin Hood and His Crew of Soldiers (1627), both anonymous, The Sad Shepherd or a Tale of Robin Hood (unfinished), B. Jonson (1637), Robin Hood, an opera (1730), Robin Hood, an opera by Dr. Arne and Burney (1741), Robin Hood, a musical farce (1751), Robin Hood, a comic opera (1784), Robin Hood, an opera by O'Keefe, music by Shield (1787), Robin Hood, by Macnally (before 1820). Sheridan began a drama on the same subject, which he called The Foresters.

PERIPHETES (4 syl) of Argolis, surnamed "The Club-bearer," because he used to kill his victims with an iron club.—Grecian Story

PROCRUSTES (3 syl), a famous robber of Attica. His real name was Polypemon or Damastês, but he received the sobriquet of Procrustes or "The Stretcher," from his practice of placing all victims that fell into his hands on a certain bedstead. If the victim was too short to fit it, he stretched the limbs to the right length, if too long, he lopped off the redundant part — Grecian Story

REX (William), executed at Old Bailey in 1828

SHEPPARD (Jack), an ardent, reckless, generous youth, wholly unrivalled as a thief and burglar. His father was a carpenter in Spitalfields. Sentence of death was passed on him in August, 1724, but when the warders came to take him to execution, they found he had escaped. He was apprehended in the following October, and again made his escape. A third time he was caught, and in November suffered death. Certainly the most popular burglar that ever lived (1701-1724)

 Daniel Defoe made Jack Sheppard the hero of a romance in 1724, and H. Ainsworth in 1839

SINIS, a Corinthian highwayman, surnamed "The Pine-Bender," from his custom of attaching the limbs of his victims to two opposite pines forcibly bent down. Immediately the trees were released, they bounded back, tearing the victim limb from limb — Grecian Story

TERMIEROS, a robber of Peloponnesos, who killed his victims by cracking their skulls against his own

TURPIN (Dick), a noted highwayman (1711-1739). His ride to York is described by H. Ainsworth in his Rookwood (1834)

WHITNEY (James), the last of the "gentlemanly" highwaymen. He prided himself on being "the glass of fashion, and the mould of form." Executed at Porter's Block, near Smithfield (1660-1694)

WILD (Jonathan), a cool, calculating, heartless villain, with the voice of a Stentor. He was born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, and, like Sheppard, was the son of a carpenter. Unlike Sheppard, this cold-blooded villain was universally execrated. He was hanged at Tyburn (1682-1725)

 Defoe made Jonathan Wild the hero of a romance in 1725, Fielding in 1741

Think. It was Descartes who said, "I think, and therefore I exist" (Cogito, ergo sum, 1596-1650)

"Higher than himself can no man think" was the saying of Protagoras

Think "Cogitation resides not in that man that does not think" — Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, act 1 sc 2 (1604)

Third Founder of Rome (The), Caius Marius. He was so called because he overthrew the multitudinous hordes of Cambrians and Teutons who came to lick up the Romans as the oxen of the field lick up grass (B.C. 102)

 The first founder was Romulus, and the second Camillus

Thirsil and Thelgon, two gentle swains who were kinsmen. Thelgon exhorts Thirsil to wake his "too long sleeping Muse," and Thirsil, having collected the nymphs and shepherds around him, sang to them the song of The Purple Island — Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island, 1, 11 (1633)

Thirsty (The), Colman Itadach, surnamed "The Thirsty," was a monk of the rule of St. Patrick. Itadach, in strict observance of the Patrician rule, refused to quench his thirst even in the harvest-field, and died in consequence

Thirteen Precious Things of Britain

1 DYRWAEN (the sword of Rhydderch Hael). If any man except Hael drew this blade, it burst into a flame from point to hilt

2 THE BASKET OF GWYDDNO GARANNIR. If food for one man were put therein, it multiplied till it sufficed for a hundred

3 THE HORN OF BRAN GAIED, in which was always found the very beverage that each drinker most desired

4 THE PLATTER OF RHUGYRDD YSGOLHAIG, which always contained the very food that the eater most liked

5 THE CHARIOT OF MORGAN MWYNAWR. Whoever sat therein was transported instantaneously to the place he wished to go to

6 THE HALTER OF CLYDNO EIDDY. Whatever horse he wished for was always found therein. It hung on a staple at the foot of his bed

7 THE KNIFE OF LLAWIRODDED FARCHAWG, which would serve twenty-four men simultaneously at any meal

8 THE CAIDRON OF TYRNOG. If meat were put in for a brave man, it was cooked instantaneously, but meat for a coward would never get boiled therein

9 THE WHISTONE OF TUDWAL TUDGLOD. If the sword of a brave man were sharpened thereon, its cut was certain death, but if of a coward, the cut was harmless

10 THE ROBE OF PADARN BRISKUDD, which fitted every one of gentle birth, but no churl could wear it

11. THE MANTLE OF TEGAU ELVRON, which only fitted ladies whose conduct was irreproachable

12 THE MANTLE OF KING ARTHUR, which could be worn or used as a carpet, and whoever wore it or stood on it was invisible This mantle or carpet was called Gwenn

 The ring of Luned rendered the wearer invisible so long as the stone of it was concealed

13 THE CHESSBOARD OF GWFNDOLL When the men were placed upon it they played of themselves The board was of gold, and the men silver — Welsh Romance

Thirteen Unlucky It is said that it is unlucky for thirteen persons to sit down to dinner at the same table, because one of the number will die before the year is out This silly superstition is based on the "Last Supper," when Christ and His twelve disciples sat at meat together Jesus, of course, was crucified, and Judas Iscariot hanged himself

Thirty (The) So the Spartan senate established by Lycurgus was called

Similarly, the Venetian senate was called "The Forty"

Thirty Tyrants (The) So the governors appointed by Lysander the Spartan over Athens were called (B C 404) They continued in power only eight months, when Thrasybulos deposed them and restored the republic

The Thirty put more people to death in eight months of peace than the enemy had done in a war of thirty years. — Xenophon

Thirty Tyrants of Rome (The), a fanciful name, applied by Trebellius Pollio to a set of adventurers who tried to make themselves masters of Rome at sundry times between A D 260 and 267

The number was not thirty, and the analogy between them and "The Thirty Tyrants of Athens" is scarcely perceptible

Thirty Years' War (The), a series of wars between the protestants and catholics of Germany, terminated by the "Peace of Westphalia" The war arose thus The emperor of Austria interfered in the struggle between the protestants and catholics, by depriving the protestants of Bohemia of their religious privileges, in consequence of which the protestants flew to arms After the contest had been going on for some years, Richelieu joined the protestants (1635), not from any love to their cause, but solely to humiliate Austria and Spain (1618-1648)

The Peloponnesian war between Athens and Sparta is called "The Thirty Years' War" (B C 404-431)

Thysbe (2 syl), a beautiful Babylonian maid, beloved by Pyramus, her next-door neighbour As their parents forbade their marriage, they contrived to hold intercourse with each other through a chink in the garden wall Once they agreed to meet at the tomb of Ninus Thysbe was first at the trysting-place, but, being scared by a lion, took to flight, and accidentally dropped her robe, which the lion tore and stained with blood Pyramus, seeing the blood-stained robe, thought that the lion had eaten Thysbe, and so killed himself When Thysbe returned and saw her lover dead, she killed herself also Shakespeare has borrowed this pretty tale in his Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

Thom'ahn, a shepherd who laughed to scorn the notion of love, but was ultimately entangled in its wiles He tells Willy that one day, hearing a rustling in a bush, he discharged an arrow, when up flew Cupid into a tree A battle ensued between them, and when the shepherd, having spent all his arrows, ran away, Cupid shot him in the heel Thom'ahn did not much heed the wound at first, but soon it festered inwardly and rankled daily more and more — Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, III (1579)

Thom'ahn is again introduced in cel vii, when he inveighs against the catholic priests in general, and the shepherd Palinode (3 syl) in particular This eclogue could not have been written before 1578, as it refers to the sequestration of Grindal archbishop of Canterbury in that year

Thomas (Monsieur), the fellow-traveller of Valentine Valentine's niece Mary is in love with him — Beaumont and Fletcher, Mons Thomas (1619)

Thomas (Sir), a dogmatist, prating, self-sufficient squire, whose judgments are but "justices' justice" — Crabbe, Borough, x (1810)

Thomas à Kempis, the pseudonym of Jean Charlier de Gerson (1363-1429) Some say, of Thomas Hummerlein of Kempen, an Augustan (1380-1471)

Thomas the Rhymer or "Thomas of Creeldoun," an ancient Scottish bard His name was Thomas Learmont, and he lived in the days of Wallace (thirteenth century)

This personage the Merlin of Scotland was a magician as well as a poet and prophet. He is alleged still to be living in the land of Faery and is expected to return at some great convulsion of society in which he is to act a distinguished part.—Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous (time Henry I)

* * If Thomas the Rhymer lived in the thirteenth century, it is an anachronism to allude to him in Castle Dangerous, the plot of which novel is laid in the twelfth century

* * Thomas the Rhymer, and Thomas Rymer were totally different persons The latter was an historiographer, who compiled The Fædera (1638-1713)

Thopas (Sir), a native of Popering, in Flanders, a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner Sir Thopas resolved to marry no one but an "elf queen," and accordingly started for Faeryland On his way, he met the three-headed giant Olifaunt, who challenged him to single combat Sir Thopas asked permission to go for his armour, and promised to meet the giant next day Here mine host broke in with the exclamation, "Intolerable stuff!" and the story was left unfinished—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Rime of Sir Thopas," 1388)

Thoresby (Broad), one of the troopers under Fitzurse—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Thornberry (Job), a brazer in Penzance He was a blunt but kind man, strictly honest, most charitable, and doting on his daughter Mary Job Thornberry is called "John Bull," and is meant to be a type of a genuine English tradesman, unsophisticated by cant and foreign manners He failed in business "through the treachery of a friend," but Peregrine, to whom he had lent ten guineas, returning from Calcutta after the absence of thirty years, gave him £10,000, which he said his loan had grown to by honest trade

Mary Thornberry, his daughter, in love with Frank Rochdale, son and heir of sir Simon Rochdale, whom ultimately she married—G Colman, junior, John Bull (1805)

Thornhaugh (Colonel), an officer in Cromwell's army—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Thornhill (Sir William), alias Mr Burchell, about 30 years of age Most generous and most whimsical, most benevolent and most sensitive Sir William was the landlord of Dr Primrose, the vicar of Wakefield After travelling through Europe on foot, he had returned and lived incognito In the garb and aspect of a pauper, Mr Burchell is introduced to the vicar of Wakefield Twice he rescued his daughter Sophia—once when she was thrown from her horse into a deep stream, and once when she was abducted by squire Thornhill Ultimately, he married her—Goldsmith, The Vicar of Wakefield (1766)

Thornhill (Squire), nephew of sir William Thornhill He enjoyed a large fortune, but was entirely dependent on his uncle He was a sad libertine, who abducted both the daughters of Dr Primrose, and cast the old vicar into jail for rent after the entire loss of his house, money, furniture, and books by fire Squire Thornhill tried to impose upon Olivia Primrose by a false marriage, but was caught in his own trap, for the marriage proved to be legal in every respect—Goldsmith, The Vicar of Wakefield (1766)

This worthy citizen abused the aristocracy much on the same principle as the fair Olivia deprecated squire Thornhill—he had a sneaking affection for what he abused.—Lord Lytton.

Thornton (Captain), an English officer—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Thornton (Cyril), the hero and title of a novel of military adventure, by captain Thomas Hamilton (1827)

So again Every ninth wave is said to be the largest

[77 ep] watched the great sea fall, Wave after wave each mightier than the last Till last a ninth one, gathering half the deep

A full of woe, slowly rose and brought Roaring and all the wave was in a foam.
Tennyson, The Holy Grail (1833-37)

A wonder is said to last three times three days. The scourge used for criminals is a "cat o' nine tails." Possession is nine points of the law, being equal to (1) money to make good a claim, (2) patience to carry a suit through, (3) a good cause, (4) a good lawyer, (5) a good counsel, (6) good witnesses, (7) a good jury, (8) a good judge, (9) good luck. Leases used to be granted for 999 years. Ordeals by fire consisted of three times three red-hot ploughshares.

There are three times three crowns recognized in heraldry, and three times three marks of cadency.

We show honour by a three times three in drinking a health.

The worthies are three Jews, three pagans, and three Christians viz, Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabeus, Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar, Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon. The worthies of London are three times three also (1) sir William Wellesworth, (2) sir Henry Pritchard, (3) sir William Se enoke, (4) sir Thomas White, (5) sir John Borham, (6) Christopher Croler, (7) sir John Hawkwood, (8) sir Hugh Caverley, (9) sir Henry Mulcaster (Richard Johnson, The Nine Worthies of London).

* * * Those who take any interest in this subject can easily multiply the examples here set down to a much greater number (See below, the Welsh Triads.)

Three Ardent Lovers of Britain (The) (1) Caswallawn son of Beli, the ardent lover of Flur daughter of Mughnagh Gor, (2) Tristan or Tristram son of Talluch, the ardent lover of Iselt wife of March Merchawn his uncle, generally called King Mark of Cornwall, (3) Kyron son of Clydno Eiddin, the ardent lover of Morveth daughter of Uenon of Rheged — Welsh Triads

Three Battle Knights (The) in the court of King Arthur (1) Cadwr earl of Cornwall, (2) Launcelot du Lac, (3) Owain son of Uenon prince of Rheged, i.e. Cumberland and some of the adjacent lands. These three would never retreat from battle, neither for spear, nor sword, nor arrow, and Arthur knew no shame in fight when they were present — Welsh Triads

Three Closures (The) of the island of Britain (1) The head of Vran son of Llŷr, surnamed "The Blessed," which was buried under the White Tower of London, and so long as it remained there, no invader would enter the island. (2) The bones of Vortimer, surnamed "The Blessed," buried in the chief harbour of the island, so long as they remained there, no hostile ship would approach the coast. (3) The dragons buried by Lludd son of Beli, in the city of Pharaon, in the Snowdon rocks (See THREE FATAL DISCLOSURES) — Welsh Triads, liii

Three Counselling Knights (The) of the court of King Arthur (1) Kyron or Cynon son of Clydno Eiddin, (2) Aron son of Kynfarch ap Meirchion Gul, (3) Llywarch Hen son of Elidir Iddinryon. So long as Arthur followed the advice of these three, his success was invariable, but when he neglected to follow their counsel his defeat was sure. — Welsh Triads

Three Diademed Chiefs (The) of the island of Britain (1) Kai son of Kynyr, the sewer of king Arthur. He could transform himself into any shape he pleased. Always ready to fight, and always worsted. Half knight and half buffoon. (2) Trystan mab Tallwch, one of Arthur's three heralds, and one whom nothing could divert from his purpose, he is generally called sir Tristram. (3) Gweryl mab Gwestad, the melancholy. "When sad, he would let one of his lips drop below his waist, while the other turned up like a cap upon his head."—The Mabinogion, 227

Three Disloyal Tribes (The) of the island of Britain (1) the tribe of Goronwy Pebyr, which refused to stand substitute for their lord, Llewellyn Gyfies, when a poisoned dart was sent him by Llech Goronwy, (2) the tribe of Gwrgi, which deserted their lord, Cner Grew, when he met Eda Glinmawr in battle (both were slain), (3) the tribe of Alan Vyrnan, which slunk away from their lord on his journey to Camlan, where he was slain.—Welsh Triads, 221

Three Estates of the Realm the nobility, the clergy, and the commonalty

N B.—The sovereign is not one of the three estates

Three Fatal Disclosures (The) of the island of Britain (1) That of the buried head of Vran "the Blessed" by king Arthur, because he refused to hold the sovereignty of the land except by his own strength, (2) that of the bones of Vortimer by Vortigern, out of love for Rowen (Rowena) daughter of Hengist the Saxon, (3) that of the dragons in Snowdon by Vortigern, in revenge of the Cymryan displeasure against him, having this done, he invited over the Saxons in his defence. Three Weeks after Marriage, a comedy by A. Murphy (1776) Sir Charles Racket has married the daughter of a rich London tradesman, and three weeks of the honeymoon having expired, he comes on a visit to the lady's father, Mr Drugget. Old Drugget plumes himself on his aristocratic son-in-law, so far removed from the vulgar brawls of merner folk. On the night of their arrival, the bride and bridegroom quarrel about a game of whist, the lady maintained that sir Charles ought to have played a diamond instead of a club. So angry is sir Charles that he resolves to have a divorce, and although the quarrel is pitched up, Mr Drugget has seen enough of the beau monde to decline the alliance of Lovelace for his second daughter, whom he gives to a Mr Woodley

Three Writers (The) The Scriptores Tres are Richardus Cornensis, Gildas Badonicus, and Nennius Banchorensis, three who wrote on The Ancient History of the British Nation, edited, etc., by Julius Bertram (1757)

* * * The Five Writers or Scriptores Quinque are five English chronicles on the early history of England, edited by Thomas Gule (1691). The names of these chroniclers are William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger Hoveden, Ethelwerd, and Ingulphus of Croyland

The Ten Writers or Scriptores Decem are the authors of ten ancient chronicles on English history, compiled and edited by Roger Twysden and John Selden (1652). The collection contains the chronicles of Simeon of Durham, John of Hexham, Richard of Hexham, Ailred of Rievall, Ralph de Diceto, John Brompton, Gervase of Canterbury, Thomas Stabbs, William Thorn, and Henry Knighton (See SIX CHRONICLERS)

Thresher (Captain), the feigned leader of a body of lawless Irishmen, who attacked, in 1806, the collectors of tithes and their subordinates

Captain Right was a leader of the rebellious peasantry in the south of Ireland in the eighteenth century

Captain Rock was the assumed name of a leader of Irish insurgents in 1822

Throgmorton Street (London).

So named from sir Nicholas Throckmorton, banker (1513-1571)

(Sir Nicholas took part in Wyatt's rebellion)

Thrummy-Cap, a sprite which figures in the fairy tales of Northumberland. He was a "queer-looking little auld man," whose scene of exploits generally lay in the vaults and cellars of old castles. John Skelton, in his Colyn Clout, calls him Tom-a-Thrum, and says that the clergy could neither write nor read, and were no wiser than this cellar sprite.

Thrush (Song of the) White hat, white hat

Kiss me quick.

Thulé (2 syl), the most remote northern portion of the world known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, but whether an island or part of a continent nobody knows. It is first mentioned by Pithias, the Greek navigator, who says it is "six days' sail from Britain," and that its climate is a "mixture of earth, air, and sea." Ptolemy, with more exactitude, tells us that the 63° of north latitude runs through the middle of Thulé, and adds that "the days there are at the equinoxes [sic] twenty-four hours long." This, of course, is a blunder, but the latitude would do roughly for Iceland.

(No place has a day of twenty-four hours long at either equinox, but anywhere beyond either polar circle the day is twenty-four hours long at one of the solstices.)

Thulé (2 syl) Antonius Diogenes, a Greek, wrote a romance on "The Incredible Things beyond Thulé" (Ta lupar Thoulén Apista), which has furnished the basis of many subsequent tales. The work is not extant, but Photius gives an outline of its contents in his Bibliotheca.

Thumb (Tom), a dwarf no bigger than a man's thumb. He lived in the reign of king Arthur, by whom he was knighted. He was the son of a common ploughman, and was killed by the poisonous breath of a spider in the reign of Thunstone, the successor of king Arthur. Amongst his adventures may be mentioned the following — He was lying one day asleep in a meadow, when a cow swallowed him as she cropped the grass. At another time, he rode in the ear of a horse. He crept up the sleeve of a giant, and so tickled him that he shook his sleeve, and Tom, falling into the sea, was swallowed by a fish. The fish being caught and carried to the palace, gave the little man his introduction to the king.

* * The oldest version extant of this nursery tale is in rhyme, and bears the following title — Tom Thumb, His Life and Death, wherein is declared many marvellous acts of manhood, full of wonder and strange merriments. Which little knight lived in king Arthur's time, and was famous in the court of Great Brittain. London printed for John Wright, 1630 (Bodleian Library). It begins thus

In Arthur's court Tom Thumb's did live—
A man of mickle might
The best of all the Table Round
And eke a doughty knight,
His stature but an inch in height,
Or quarter of a span
Then thinke you not this little knight
Was proud a valliant man?

N B — "Great Britain" was not a recognized term till 1701 (queen Anne), when the two parliaments of Scotland and England were united. Before that time, England was called "South Britain," Scotland "North Britain," and Brittany "Little Britain." The date 1630 would carry us back to the reign of Charles I.

Fielding, in 1730, wrote a burlesque opera called Tom Thumb, which was altered in 1778 by Kane O'Hara. Dr Arne wrote the music to it, and his daughter (afterwards Mrs Cibber), then only 14, acted the part of "Tom Thumb" at the Haymarket Theatre — f Davies, Life of Garrick.

* * Here again the dates do not correctly fit in. Mrs Cibber was born 1710, and must have been 20 when Fielding produced his opera of Tom Thumb.

Thumb (General Tom), a dwarf exhibited in London in 1846. His real name was Charles S Stratton. At the age of 25, his height was 25 inches, and his weight 25 lbs. He was born at Bridgeport, Connecticut, United States, in 1832, and died in January, 1879.

They rush by thousands to see Tom Thumb. They push they fight they scream they faint they cry "Help!" and "Murder!" They see my bills and caravan but do not read them. Their eyes are on them but their sense is gone. In one week 12 000 persons paid to see Tom Thumb while only 1334 paid to see my Aristides. — Haydon the artist. MS Diary

Tiburzio, commander of the Pisans in their attack upon Florence, in the fifteenth century. The Pisans were thoroughly beaten by the Florentines, led by Lucretia Moor, and Tiburzio was taken captive. Tiburzio tells Lorna that the men of Florence will cast him off after peace is established, and advises him to join Pisa. This Lorna is far too noble to do, but he grants Tiburzio his liberty.

 Tiburzio, being examined by the council of Florence, under the hope of finding some cause of censure against the Moor, to lessen or cancel their obligation to him,
 "testifies to his unflinching probity," and the council could find no cause of blame, but Lorna, by poison, relieves the ungrateful state of its obligation to him — Robert Browning, Lorna

Tichborne Dole (The). When lady Mabella was dying, she requested her husband to grant her the means of leaving a charitable bequest. It was to be a dole of bread, to be distributed annually on the feast of the Annunciation, to any who chose to apply for it. Sir Roger, her husband, said he would give her as much land as she could walk over while a billet of wood remained burning. The old lady was taken into the park, and managed to crawl over twenty-three acres of land, which was accordingly set apart, and is called "the crawls" to this hour. When the lady Mabella was taken back to her chamber, she said, "So long as this dole is continued, the family of Tichborne shall prosper, but immediately it is dis-
 failure of an heir male. Thus," she added, "will be when a family of seven sons is succeeded by one of seven daughters."
 The custom began in the reign of Henry II, and continued till 1796, when, singularly enough, the baron had seven sons and his successor seven daughters, and Mr Edward Tichborne, who inherited the Doughty estates, dropping the original name, called himself sir Edward Doughty.

Tilbury'na, the daughter of the governor of Tilbury Fort, in love with Whiskerandos. Her love-ravings are the crest unto the crest of burlesque tragedy (see act II 1)—Sheridan, The Critic (1779)

An oyster may be crossed in love says the gentle Tilbury'na—Sir W Scott

Tilbury Fort (The governor of), father of Tilbury'na, a plain, matter-of-fact man, with a gushing, romantic, and love-struck daughter. In Mr Puff's tragedy, The Spanish Armada—Sheridan, The Critic (1779)

Tim Syllabub, a droll creature, equally good at a rebus, a riddle, a bawdy song, or a tabernacle hymn. You may easily recognize him by his shabby finery, his frizzled hair, his dirty shirt, and his half-genteel, but more than half-shabby dress—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, XXI (1759)

Times (The), a newspaper founded by John Walter, in 1785. It was first called The London Daily Universal Register, in 1788 the words The Times or were added. This long title was never tolerated by the public, which always spoke of the journal as The Register, till the original title was suppressed, and the present title, The Times, remained. In 1803 John Walter, son of the founder, became manager, and greatly improved the character of the paper, and in 1814 introduced a steam press. He died in 1847, and was succeeded by his son John Walter III. In the editorial department, John (afterwards "sir John") Stoddart (nicknamed "Dr Slop"), who began to write political articles in The Times in 1810, was appointed editor in 1812, but in 1816 was dismissed for his rabid hatred of Napoleon. He tried to establish an opposition journal, The New Times, which proved an utter failure. Sir John Stoddart was succeeded by John Stebbing, then followed Thomas Barnes ("Mr T Bounce"), who remained editor till his death, in 1841. W F A Delane came next, and continued till 1858, when his son, John Thaddeus Delane (who died in 1879), succeeded him. The present editor (1880) is said to be Mr Thomas Chenery. The following gentlemen were connected with this paper between 1870 and 1880—

Called "The Thunderer" from an article contributed by captain F Sterling, beginning "We thundered forth the other day an article on the subject of social and political reform," and "The Turnabout," because its politics jump with the times, and are not fossilized whig or tory.

Tim'ias, king Arthur's 'squire He went after the "wicked foster," from whom Florimel fled, and the "foster" with his two brothers, falling on him, were all slain Timias, overcome by fatigue, now fell from his horse in a swoon, and Belphabê the huntress, happening to see him fall, ran to his succour, applied an ointment to his wounds, and bound them with her scarf The 'squire, opening his eyes, exclaimed, "Angel or goddess, do I call thee right?" "Neither," replied the maid, "but only a wood-nymph" Then was he set upon his horse and taken to Belphabê's pavilion, where he soon "recovered from his wounds, but lost his heart" (bk iii 6) In bk iv 7 Belphabê subsequently found Timias in dalliance with Amoret, and said to him, "Is this thy faith?" She said no more, "but turned her face and fled" This is an allusion to sir Walter Raleigh's amour with Elizabeth Throgmorton (Amoret), one of the queen's maids of honour, which drew upon sir Walter (Timias) the passionate displeasure of his royal mistress (Belphabê or queen Elizabeth) — Spenser, Faery Queen, iii (1590)

Timms (Corporal), a non-commissioned officer in Waverley's regiment — Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Timoleon, the Corinthian He hated tyranny, and slew his own brother, whom he dearly loved, because he tried to make himself absolute in Corinth "Timophônês he loved, but freedom more"

The fair Corinthian boast
Timoleon happy temper mild and firm
Who wept the brother while the tyrant fled
Thomson, The Seasons (Winter 1726)

Timon the Man-hater, an Athenian who lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war Shakespeare has a drama so called (1609) The drama begins with the joyous life of Timon, and his hospitable extravagance, then launches into his pecuniary embarrassment, and the discovery that his "professed friends" will not help him, and ends with his flight into the woods, his misanthropy, and his death

When he (Horace Walpole) talked misanthropy he out-Timoned Timon — Macaulay

* * * On one occasion, Timon said, "I have a fig tree in my garden which I once intended to cut down, but I shall let it stand, that any one who likes may go and hang himself on it"

Timon's Banquet, nothing but cover and warm water Being shunned by his friends in adversity, he pretended to have recovered his money, and invited his false friends to a banquet The table was laden with covers, but when the contents were exposed, nothing was provided but lukewarm water (See SCHACABAC, p 875) — Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, act iii sc 6 (1609)

Timoth'eos, a musician, who charged double fees to all pupils who had learned music before — Quintilian, De Institutione Oratoria, ii 3

Ponocrates made him forget all that he (Gargantua) had learned under other masters, as Timotheus did to his disciples who had been taught music by others — Rabelais, Gargantua i 23 (1533)

Timothy (Old), ostler at John Mengs's inn at Kirchhoff — Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Timothy Quant, the whimsical but faithful steward of governor Heartall, blunt, self-willed, but loving his master above all things, and true to his interests — Cberry, The Soldier's Daughter (1804)

Ti'murkan the Tartar, and conqueror of China After a usurpation of twenty years, he was slain in a rising of the people by Zaphimri "the orphan of China"

My mind's employed on other arts
To aling the well stored quiver
Over this arm and wing the darts
At the first reindeer sweeping down the vale
Or up the mountain straining every nerve
To vault the neighing steed and urge his course
Swifter than whirlwinds through the ranks of war —
These are my passions, this my only science
Raised from a soldier to imperial sway,
I still will reign in terror

Murphy The Orphan of China iv 1

Tinacrio "the Sage," father of Micomico'na queen of Micom'icon, and husband of queen Zaramilla. He foretold that after his death his daughter would be dethroned by the giant Pandaflando, but that in Spain she would find a champion in don Quixote who would restore her to the throne. This adventure comes to nothing, as don Quixote is taken home in a cage without entering upon it—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I iv 3 (1605)

Tinclarian Doctor (The Great), William Mitchell, a whitesmith and tin-plate worker of Edinburgh, who published Tinlar's Testament, dedicated to queen Anne, and other similar works.

The reason why I call myself the Tinclarian doctor is because I am a tinklar and cures old pans and lanterns.—Introduction to Tinklar's Testament

* * Uniformity of spelling must not be looked for in the "doctor's" book. We have "Tinklar," "Tinkler," and "Tinclar-ian."

Tinderbox (Miss Jenny), a lady with a moderate fortune, who once had some pretensions to beauty. Her elder sister happened to marry a man of quality, and Jenny ever after resolved not to disgrace herself by marrying a tradesman. Having rejected many of her equals, she became at last the governess of her sister's children, and had to undergo the drudgery of three servants without receiving the wages of one—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, xviii (1759).

Tinker (The Immortal or The Inspired), John Bunyan (1628–1688).

Elhu Burritt, United States, is called "The Learned Blacksmith" (1811–1879).

Tinsel (Lord), a type of that worst specimen of aristocracy, which ignores all merit but blue blood, and would rather patronize a horse-jockey than a curate, scholar, or poor gentleman. He would subscribe six guineas to the concerts of signor Cantata, because lady Dangle patronized him, but not one penny to "languages, arts, and sciences," as such—S Knowles, The Hunchback (1831).

Tintag'el or TINTAGIL, a strong and magnificent castle on the coast of Cornwall, said to have been the work of two giants. It was the birthplace of king Arthur, and subsequently the royal residence of king Mark. Dunlop asserts that vestiges of the castle still exist.

They found a naked child upon the sands
Of dark Tintagil by the Cornish sea,
And that was Arthur.

Tennyson, Quinquer (1833)

Tinto (Dick), a poor artist, son of a tailor in the village of Langdirdum. He is introduced as a lad in the Bride of Lammermoor, i. This was in the reign of William III. He is again introduced in St Ronan's Well, i, as touching up the signboard of Meg Dods, in the reign of George III. As William III died in 1702, and George III began to reign in 1760, Master Dick must have been a patriarch when he worked for Mrs Dods—Sir W Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (1819), St Ronan's Well (1823).

Meg Dods agreed with the celebrated Dick Tinto to repaint her father's sign which had become rather undecipherable. Dick accordingly gilded the bishop's crook and augmented the horrors of the devil's peck, until it became a terror to all the younger fry of the school house—St Ronan's Well i.

Tintoretto, the historical painter, whose real name was Jacopo Robusti. He was called Il Furoso from the extreme rapidity with which he painted (1512–1594).

Tintoretto of England (The), W Dobson was called "The Tintoret of England" by Charles I (1610–1646).

Tintoretto of Switzerland (The), John Huber (eighteenth century).

Tiphany, the mother of the three kings of Cologne. The word is manifestly a corruption of St Epiphany, as Tibs is of St Ubes, Taudry of St Audry, Tooley [Street] of St Olaf, Telder of St Etheldred, and so on.

Scores of the saints have similarly manufactured names.

Ti'phys, pilot of the Argonauts, hence any pilot.

Many a Tiphys ocean a depths explore
To open wondrous ways untried before.
Ariosto Orlando Furioso viii. (Hoole)

* * Another name for a pilot or guiding power is Palinurus, so called from the steersman of Aneas.

Een Palinurus nodded at the helm.
Pope, The Dunciad iv 614 (1747).

Tippins (Lady), an old lady "with an immense obtuse, drab, oblong face, like a face in a tablespoon, and a dyed 'long walk' up the top of her head, as a convenient public approach to the bunch of false hair behind." She delights "to patronize Mrs Veneering," and Mrs Veneering is delighted to be patronized by her ladyship.

Lady Tippins is always attended by a lover or two, and she keeps a little list of her lovers, and is always booking a new lover or striking out an old lover or putting a lover in her black list, or promoting a lover to her blue list, or adding up her lovers or otherwise posting her book, which she calls her Cupidon.—C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, II (1854)

Tipple, in Dudley's Fitch of Bacon, first introduced John Edwin into notice (1750-1790)

Edwin's Tipple," In the Fitch of Bacon was an exquisite treat.—Bosden.

Tippoo Saib (Prince), son of Hyder Ali nawaub of Mysore—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Tips or "Examination Crams" Recognized stock pieces of what is called "book work" in university examinations are Iernat's theorem, the "Ludus Trojannus" in Virgil's Aeneid (bk vi), Agnes's "Witch," the "Cissoid" of Diocles, and the famous fragment of Solon, generally said to be by Euripides

In law examinations the stock pieces are the Justinian of Sandars, the Digest of Evidence of sir James Stephen, and the Ancient Law of sir Henry Maine

The following are recognized primers—Mills Logic, Spence's First Principles, Maine's Ancient Law, Lessing's Laocoon, Ritter and Preller's Fragmenta, Whenton's International Law

Tip-tilted. Tennyson says that Lynette had "her slender nose tip-tilted like the petals of a flower"—Tennyson Gareth and Lynette (1858)

Tiptoe, footman to Random and Scruple He had seen better days, but, being found out in certain dishonest transactions, had lost grade, and "Tiptoe, who once stood above the world," came into a position in which "all the world stood on Tiptoe" He was a shrewd, lazy, knowing rascal, better adapted to dubious adventure, but always sighing for a snug berth in some wealthy, sober, old-fashioned, homely, county family, with good wages, liberal diet, and little work to do—G Colman, Ways and Means (1788)

Tiran'te the White, the hero and title of a romance of chivalry

Let me see that book," said the curé "we shall find in it a fund of amusement. Here we shall find that famous knight don Kyrie Elyson of Montalban and Thomas his brother with the knight Fonseca the battle which Detral antic fought with Alano the stratagem of the Widow Tranquill the amour of the empress with her squire and the witticisms of lady Brillante. This is one of the most amusing books ever written—Cervantes, Don Quixote L I 6 (1635)

Tiresias, a Theban soothsayer, blind from boyhood It is said that Athena deprived him of sight, but gave him the power of understanding the language of birds, and a staff as good as eyesight to direct his way Another tale is that, seeing a male and female serpent in copulation, he killed the male, and was metamorphosed into a woman, seven years later he saw a similar phenomenon, and killed the female, whereupon he became a man again Thus, when Jupiter and Juno wished to know whether man or woman had the greater enjoyment in married life, they referred the question to Tiresias, who declared that the pleasure of the woman is tenfold greater than that of the man (See CALLIS)

In troth," said Jove (and as he spoke he laughed While to his queen from nectar bowls he quaffed)

The sense of pleasure in the male is far More dull and dead than what you females have."

Juno the truth of what he said denied Tiresias therefore must the case decide

For he the pleasure of each sex had tried

Addison The Transformation of Tiresias (1719)

There is an awful thing which much perplexes, Unless like wise Tiresias we had proved

By turns the difference of the several sexes.

Byron Don Juan xiv 73 (1794)

* * The name is generally pronounced Ti're'sias, but Milton calls it Ti're'sus

Blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides (Homer).

And Tiresias and I hincus (Plautus) prophets of I Paradise Lost III 36 (1666)

Tirlsneck (Jonnie), beadle of old St Roman's—Sir W Scott, St Roman's Well (time, George III)

Tirso de Moh'na, the pseudonym of Gabriel Tellez, a Spanish monk and dramatist His comedy called Contruando de Piedra (1626) was imitated by Moliere in his Festin de Pierre (1665), and has given birth to the whole host of comedies and operas on the subject of "don Juan" (1570-1648)

Tiryas (The Gallery of), one of the old Cyclopean structures mentioned by Homer, and still extant in Argolis The stones of this "gallery" are so enormous that two horses could not stir the smallest of them

* * Similar Cyclopean structures are the "treasury of Atreus," till "gate of Lions," the "tomb of Phoroneus" (3 syl), and the "tomb of Danaos," all in Mycæne

Tirynt'han Swain (The), Her'culès, called in Latin Thynthus Heros, because he generally resided at Tiryas, a town of Argolis, in Greece

Upon his shield lay that Tirynt'han swain

Scott Life of Henry VIII and other poems

Tisaphernes (4 syl), "the thunderbolt of war" He was in the army of Egypt, and was slain by Rinaldo —Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, xx (1575)

* * This son of Mars must not be mistaken for Tissaphernes the Persian satrap, who sided with the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war, and who treacherously volunteered to guide "the ten thousand" back to Greece

Tisbina, wife of Iroldo Prasildo, a Babylonish nobleman, falls in love with her, and threatens to kill himself Tishina, to divert him, tells him if he will perform certain exploits which she deemed impossible, she will return his love These exploits he accomplishes, and Tisbina, with Iroldo, take poison to avoid dishonour Prasildo discovers that the draught they have taken is harmless, and tells them so, whereupon Iroldo quits the country, and Tisbina marries Prasildo —Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato (1495) (See DIANORA, p 251, and DORIGEN, p 266)

Tisellin, the raven, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498)

Tisiph'one (4 syl), one of the three Furies Covered with a bloody robe, she sits day and night at hell-gate, armed with a whip Tibullus says her head was coifed with serpents in lieu of hair

The Desert Fairy with her head covered with snakes like Tisiphoné mounted on a winged griffin —Comte de Launois Fairy Tales (The Yellow Dwarf 1632)

Tit'an, the sun or Helios, the child of Hyperion and Basil'ea, and grandson of Caelum or heaven Virgil calls the sun "Titan," and so does Ovid

primo crastinus ortus
Extulerit Titan radisque retexerit orbem.
Æneid iv 118 119

A maiden queen that shone at Titan's ray Spenser Fairy Queen l 4 (1599).

Titans, giants, sons of Heaven and Earth Their names were Océanos, Kæos, Kronos, Hyperion, Iap'etos, and Kronos The Titanides were Thia [Thia], Rheia, Themis, Mnemosynê, Phœbé, and Tethys

Titan'ia, queen of the fairies, and wife of Oberon Oberon wanted her to give him for a page a little changeling, but Titania refused to part with him, and this led to a fairy quarrel Oberon, in revenge, anointed the eyes of Titania during sleep with an extract of "Love in Idleness," the effect of which was to make her fall in love with the first object she saw on waking The first object Titania set eyes on happened to be a country bumpkin, whom Puck had dressed up with di-

ass's head While Titania was fondling this "unamiable creature," Oberon came upon her, sprinkled on her an antidote, and Titania, thoroughly ashamed of herself, gave up the boy to her spouse, after which a reconciliation took place between the wifal fairies —Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

Tite Barnacle (Mr), head of the Circumlocution Office, and a very great man in his own opinion The family had intermarried with the Stiltskings, and the Barnacles and Stiltskings found berths pretty readily in the national workshop, where brains and conceit were in inverse ratio The young gents in the office usually spoke with an eye-glass in the eye, in this sort of style "Oh, I say, look here! Can't attend to you to-day, you know But look here! I say, can't you call to-morrow?" "No" "Well, but I say, look here! Is this public business?" —anything about—tonnage—or that sort of thing?" Having made his case understood, Mr Clennam received the following instructions in these words —

You must find out all about it. Then you'll memo-

Dante Purgatory ix. (1295).

Tithor'ea, one of the two chief summits of Parnassus It was dedicated to Bacchus, the other (Lycorêa) being dedicated to the Muses and Apollo

Titian (Tiziano Vecellio), an Italian landscape painter, especially famous for his elonds (1477-1576)

Titian (The French), Jacques Blanchard (1600-1638)

Titian (The Portuguese), Alonzo Sanchez Coello (1515-1590)

Titmarsh (Michael Angelo), a pseudonym of Thackeray. Called "Michael Angelo" from his massive body, broad shoulders, and large head (1811-1863)

Titmouse (Mr Tittlebat), a vulgar, ignorant cockeomb, suddenly raised from the degree of a linen-draper's shopman to a man of fortune, with an income of £10,000 a year—Warren, Ten Thousand a Year

Titto Mele'ma, a Greek, who marries Romola—George Eliot [Mrs Cross], Romola

Titurel, the first king of Grail-burg. He has brought into subjection all his passions, has resisted all the seductions of the world, and is modest, chaste, pious, and devout. His daughter Siguné is in love with Tschionatulander, who is slain—Wolfram von Eschenbach, Titurcl (thirteenth century)

* * * Wolfram's Titurcl is a tedious expansion of a lay already in existence, and Albert of Scharfenberg produced a Young Titurcl, at one time thought the best romance of chivalry in existence, but it is pompous, stilted, erudite, and wearisome

Titus, the son of Lucius Junius Brutus. He joined the faction of Tarquin, and was condemned to death by his father, who, having been the chief instrument in banishing the king and all his race, was created the first consul. The subject has been often dramatized. In English, by N. Lee (1679) and John Howard Payne (1820). In French, by Arnault, in 1792, and by Ponsard, in 1843. In Italian, by Alfieri, Bruto, etc. It was in Payne's tragedy that Charles Kean made his début in Glasgow as "Titus," his father playing "Brutus."

The house was filled to overflowing. The stirring interest of the play combined with the natural acting of the father and son completely subdued the audience. They sat effused in tears during the last pathetic interview until Brutus overwhelmed by his emotions, falls on the neck of Titus exclaiming in a burst of agony: "Embrace thy wretched father! when the whole theatre broke forth in long peals of applause. Edmund Kean then whispered in his son's ear: "Charlie my boy, we are doing the trick."—Cole Life of Charles Kean.

Titus, "the delight of man," the Roman emperor, son of Vespasian (40, 79-81)

Titus, the penitent thief, according to Longfellow. Dumachus and Titus were two of a band of robbers, who attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let these good people go in peace," but Dumachus replied, "First let them pay their ransom." Whereupon Titus handed to his companion forty groats, and the infant Jesus said to him:

When thirty years shall have gone by,
In Jerusalem shall die

On the accursed tree
Then on My right and My left side
These thieves shall both be crucified
And Titus thenceforth shall abide
In paradise with Me.

Longfellow The Golden Legend (1851).

Tityre Tas (long u), the name assumed in the seventeenth century by a clique of young blades of the better class, whose delight was to break windows, upset sedan-chairs, molest quiet citizens, and rudely caress pretty women in the streets at night-time. These brawlers took successively many titular names, as Muns, Hectors, Scourers, afterwards Nickers, later still Heavubites, and lastly Mohawks or Mohocks.

"Tityre tu-s" is meant for the plural of "Tityre tu," in the first line of Virgil's first Eclogue. "Tityre, tu patulæ recubans sub tegmine fagi," and meant to imply that these blades were men of leisure and fortune, who "lay at ease under their patrimonial beech trees."

Tityrus, in the Shepherd's Calendar, by Spenser (ecl u and vi), is meant for Chaucer

Spenser The Shepherd's Calendar xii. (1579)

Tityus, a giant, whose body covered nine acres of ground. In Tartarus, two vultures or serpents feed for ever on his liver, which grows as fast as it is gnawed away.

Prometheus (3 syl) is said to have been fastened to mount Caucasus, where two eagles fed on his liver, which never wasted.

Nor unobserved lay stretched upon the marble
Tityus earth-born whose body long and large Covered nine acres. There two vultures sit,
Of appetite insatiate and with beaks
For ravine bent, unintermitting goad
His liver. Powerless he is put to slit
The fierce devourers. To this penance judged
For rape intended on Lætona fair

Fenton's Homér's Odyssey xl (1716)

Tizo'na, the Cid's sword. It was buried with him, as Joyeuse (Charlemagne's sword) was buried with Charlemagne, and Durindana with Orlando.

Tlal'ala, surnamed "The Tiger," one of the Aztecs. On one occasion, being taken captive, Madoc released him, but he continued the unrelenting foe of Madoc and his new colony, and was always foremost in working them evil.

When at length, the Aztecas, being overcome, migrated to Mexico, Tlalala refused to quit the spot of his father's tomb, and threw himself on his own javelin—Southey, Madoc (1805)

Toad with an R, worthlessness, mere dung Anglo-Saxon, toird or toord, (now spelt with a u), hence in the Gospel of St Luke xiii 8 "He answeringe seide to him, Lord, suffer also this zeer, til the while I delue [delve] aboute it, and sende toordis"—Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, Bosworth, p 365, Wycliffe (1389)

Good husband his boon Or request hath afar
Ill husband as soon Hath a toad with an R.
Tusser Five Hundred Points etc. ill. 16

(A good husband has his wishes fulfilled readily, but a bad husband is served with a too[r]d as soon as with the boon requested)

Toad-Eater (Pulteney's) Henry Vane was so called, in 1742, by sir Robert Walpole Two years later, Sarah Fielding, in David Simple, speaks of "toad-eater" as "quite a new word" (Spanish, todita, "a factotum," one who will do any sort of work for his employer)

Tobacco, says Stow, in his Chronicle, was first brought to England by sir John Hawkins, in 1565 (7 Elizabeth)

Before that Indian weed so strongly was embraced,
Wherein such mighty sums were prodigally waste
Dryton Polyolbion, xl. (1613).

Tobo'so (Dulcinea del), the lady chosen by don Quixote for his particular paragon Sancho Panza says she was "a stout-built, sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish" The knight had been in love with her before he took to errantry She was Aldonza Lorenzo, the daughter of Lorenzo Corchuelo and Aldonza Nogalés, but when signor Quixada assumed the dignity of knighthood, he changed the name and style of his lady into Dulcinea del Toboso, which was more befitting his rank—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I 1 1 (1605)

Toby, waiter of the Spa hotel, St Ronan's, kept by Sandie Lawson—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Toby, a brown Rockingham-ware beer jug, with the likeness of Toby Filpot embossed on its sides, "a goodly jug of well-browned clay, fashioned into the form of an old gentleman, atop of whose bald head was a fine froth answering to his wig" (ch iv)

Gabriel lifted Toby to his mouth, and took a hearty draught.—C. Dickens Master Humphrey's Clock (Barbary Ridge" xli 1841)

Toby, Punch's dog, in the puppet-show exhibition of Punch and Judy

In some versions of the great drama of Punch there is a small dog (a modern innovation) supposed to be the private property of that gentleman and of the name of Toby—always Toby This dog has been stolen in youth from another gentleman and fraudulently sold to the confiding hero who having no guile himself has no suspicion that it lurks in others but Toby entertaining a grateful recollection of his old master and scornful to attach himself to any new patron, not only refuses to smoke a pipe at the bidding of Punch but (to mark his old fidelity more strongly) seizes him by the nose and wrings the same with violence at which instance of canine attachment the spectators are always deeply affected.—C Dickens.

Toby, in the periodical called Punch, is represented as a grave, consequential, sullen, unsocial pug, perched on back volumes of the national Menippus, which he guards so stolidly that it would need a very bold heart to attempt to filch one There is no reminiscence in this Toby, like that of his peep-show namesake, of any previous master, and no aversion to his present one Punch himself is the very bean-ideal of good-natured satire and far-sighted shrewdness, while his dog (the very Diogenes of his tribe) would scorn his nature if he could be made to smile at anything

* * The first cover of immortal Punch was designed by A S Henning, the present one by Richard Doyle

Toby (Uncle), a captain, who was wounded at the siege of Namur, and was obliged to retire from the service He is the impersonation of kindness, benevolence, and simple-heartedness, his courage is undoubted, his gallantry delightful for its innocence and modesty Nothing can exceed the grace of uncle Toby's love-passages with the Widow Wadman It is said that lieutenant Sterne (father of the novelist) was the prototype of uncle Toby—Sterne, Tristram Shandy (1759)

My uncle Toby is one of the finest compliments ever paid to human nature. He is the most unoffending of God's creatures or as the French would express it, un tel petit bonhomme Of his bowling green his sleep, and his amours who would say or think anything amiss!—Hazlitt.

Toby Veck, ticket-porter and jobman, nicknamed "Trotty" from his trotting pace He was "a weak, small, spare man," who loved to earn his money, and heard the chimes ring words in accordance with his fancy, hopes, and fears After a dinner of tripe, he lived for a time in a sort of dream, and woke up on New Year's Day to dance at his daughter's wedding —C Dickens, The Chimes (1844)

Todd (Laurie), a poor Scotch nail-maker, who emigrates to America, and, after some reverses of fortune, begins life again as a brickwoodman, and greatly prospers —Galt, Laurie Todd

Tod'gers (Mrs), proprietress of a "commercial boarding-house," weighed down with the overwhelming cares of "sauces, gravy," and the wherewithal of providing for her lodgers Mrs Todgers had a "soft heart" for Mr Pecksniff, widower, and being really kind-hearted, befriended poor Merev Pecksniff in her miserable married life with her brutal husband Jonas Chuzzlewit —C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841)

Tofa'na, of Palermo, a noted poisoner, who sold a tasteless, colourless poison, called the Manna of St Nicola of Bara, but better known as Aqua Tofana. Above 600 persons fell victims to this fatal drug. She was discovered in 1659, and died 1730

La Spira or Hieronyma Spira, about a century previously, sold an "elixir" equally fatal. The secret was ultimately revealed to her father confessor

Tofts (Mistress), a famous singer towards the close of the eighteenth century. She was very fond of cats, and left a legacy to twenty of the tabby tribe

Not Nibb mourned more for fourteen brats
Nor Mistress Toft, to leave her twenty cats.
Peter Pindar [Dr Volcott], Old Simon (1809)

Togar'ma ("island of blue waves"), one of the Hebrides —Ossian, Death of Cuthullin

Togorma, the kingdom of Connal son of Colgar —Ossian, Fingal

Tohu va Bohu, at sixes and sevens, in the utmost confusion, topsy-turvy

The earth was tohu va bohu (i. e. void and) in confusion. In short a chaos. This may well be applied to a country desolated by war. (Note by Edit. John's ed.) —Rabelais, Pantagruel iv. 17 (1546)

Tomette, a confidential female servant of Argon the malade imaginaire. "Adroite, soigneuse, diligente, et surtout fidèle," but contrarious, and always calling into action her master's irritable temper. In order to cure him, she pretends to be a travelling physician of about 90 years of age, although she has not seen twenty-six summers, and in the capacity of a Galen, declares M Argon is suffering from lungs, recommends that one arm should be cut off, and one eye taken out to strengthen the remaining one. She enters into a plot to open the eyes of Argon to the real affection of Angelique (his daughter), the false love of her step-mother, and to marry the former to Cléante the man of her choice, in all which schemes she is fully successful —Moliere, Le Malade Imaginaire (1673)

Toison d'Or, chief herald of Burgundy —Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Toki, the Danish William Tell. Saxo Grammaticus, a Danish writer of the twelfth century, tells us that Toki once boasted, in the hearing of Harald Bluetooth, that he could hit an apple with his arrow off a pole, and the Danish Gessler set him to try his skill by placing an apple on the head of the archer's son (twelfth century)

Lord Byron refers to the "duel" between Francis Jeffrey editor of the Edinburgh Review, and Thomas Moore the poet, at Chalk Farm, in 1806. The duel was interrupted, and it was then found that neither of the pistols contained a bullet

Can none remember that eventful day
That ever glorious, almost fatal fray
When Little's (Thomas Moore) leafless pistol met his eye

Tole'do, famous for its sword-blades. Vienne, in the Lower Dauphine, is also famous for its swords. Its martinets (i. e. the water-mills for an iron forge) are turned by a little river called Gere

Gargantua gave Touchsuet an excellent sword of a Vienne blade with a golden scabbard —Rabelais, Gargantua i. 46 (1533)

Tolmetes (3 syl), Foolhardiness personified in The Purple Island, fully described in canto viii. His companions were Arrogance, Bragg, Carelessness, and Fear (Greek, tolmētēs, "a foolhardy man")

Thus ran the rash Tolmeets, never viewing
The fearful fiends that duly him attended
Much would he boldly do, but much more boldly vaunt
P. Fletcher, The Purple Island viii (1633)

Tom, "the Portugal dustman," who joined the allied army against France in the war of the Spanish Succession—Dr Arbuthnot, History of John Bull (1712)

Tom, one of the servants of Mr Peregrine Lovel, "with a good deal of surly honesty about him." Tom is no sneak, and no tell-tale, but he refuses to abet Philip the butler in sponging on his master, and wasting his property in riotous living. When Lovel discovers the state of affairs, and clears out his household, he returns Tom, to whom he entrusts the cellar and the plate—Rev J Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1759)

Tom Folio, Thomas Rawlinson, the biblioplist (1681-1725)

Tom Jones (1 syl), a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, mixed with dissipation. Lord Byron calls him "an accomplished blackguard" (Don Juan, xiii 110, 1824)—Fielding, Tom Jones (1749)

A hero with a flawed reputation, a hero sponging for a gulinea, a hero who cannot pay his landlady and is obliged to let his honour out to hire is absurd and the claim of Tom Jones to heroic rank is quite untenable—Thackeray

Tom Long, the hero of an old tale, entitled The Merry Conceits of Tom Long, the Carrier, being many Pleasant Passages and Mad Pranks which he observed in his Travels. This tale was at one time amazingly popular

Tom Scott, Daniel Quilp's boy, Tower Hill. Although Quilp was a demon incarnate, yet "between the boy and the dwarf there existed a strange kind of mutual liking." Tom was very fond of standing on his head, and on one occasion Quilp said to him, "Stand on your head again, and I'll cut one of your feet off."

The boy made no answer but directly Quilp had shut him self in stood on his head before the door then walked on his hands to the back and stood on his head there then to the opposite side and repeated the performance. Quilp, knowing his disposition was lying in wait at a little distance armed with a large piece of wood which being rough and jagged and studded with broken nails might possibly have hurt him if it had been thrown at him—C Dickens The Old Curiosity Shop v (1840)

Tom Thumb, the name of a very diminutive little man in the court of King Arthur, killed by the poisonous breath of a spider in the reign of King Thunstone, the successor of Arthur. In the Bodleian Library there is a ballad about Tom Thumb, which was printed in 1630. Richard Joninson wrote in prose The History of Tom Thumbe, which was printed in 1621. In 1630 Charles Perreault published his tale called Le Petit Poucet. Tom Thumb is introduced by Drayton in his Nymphidia (1568-1631).

"Tom" in this connection is the Swedish tomt ("a nix or dwarf"), as in Tomptgubbe ("a brownie or kobold"), the final t is silent, and the tale is of Scandinavian origin.

Tom Thumb, a burlesque opera, altered by Kane O'Hara (author of Midas), in 1778, from a dramatic piece by Fielding the novelist (1730). Tom Thumb, having killed the giants, falls in love with Huncamunca daughter of King Arthur. Lord Grizzle wishes to marry the princess, and when he hears that the "pygmy giant-killer" is preferred before him, his lordship turns traitor, invests the palace "at the head of his rebellious rout," and is slain by Tom. Then follows the bitter end. A red cow swallows Tom, the queen Dollalolla kills Needle, Frizalletta kills the queen, Huncamunca kills Frizalletta, Doodle kills Huncamunca, Plumant kills Doodle, and the king, being left alone, stabs himself. Merlin now enters, commands the red cow to "return our England's Hannibal," after which, the wise wizard restores all the slain ones to life again, and thus "jar ending," each resolves to go home, "and make a night out."

Soon after Liston had made his popular hit in Fielding's Tom Thumb at the Haymarket Theatre, he was invited to dine in the City and after the dessert the whole party rose, the tables and chairs were set back, and Mr Liston was requested to favour the company with Lord Grizzle's dancing song before the children went to bed. As may be supposed Liston took his hat and danced out of the house, never more to return—C Russell, Representative Actors

Tom Tiddler's Ground, a nook in a rustic by-road, where Mr Mopes the hermit lived, and had succeeded in laying it waste. In the middle of the plot was a ruined hovel, without one patch of glass in the windows, and with no plank or beam that had not rotted or fallen away. There was a slough of water, a leafless tree or two, and plenty of filth. Ramour said that Tom Mopes had murdered his beautiful wife from jealousy, and had abandoned the world. Mr Traveller tried to reason with him, and bring him back to social life, but the tanker replied, "When iron is thoroughly rotten, you cannot botch it, do what you may"—C Dickens, A Christmas Number (1861).

Tom Tiler and His Wife, a transition play between a morality and a tragedy (1578)

Tom Tiddle, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Peachum calls him "a guzzling, soaking sot, always too drunk to stand himself or to make others stand. A cart," he says, "is absolutely necessary for him"—Gay, The Beggar's Opera, I (1727)

Tom Tram, the hero of a novel entitled The Mad Plants of Tom Tram, Son-in-Law to Mother Wirtler, wherever is added his Merry Jest, Old Concoits, and Pleasant Tales (seventeenth century)

All your wit, wit, wit, and sham
I own from don Quixote to Tom Tram.

Tom-a-Thrum, a sprite which figures in the fairy tales of the Middle Ages, a "queer-looking little wild man," whose chief exploits were in the vaults and cellars of old castles. John Skelton, speaking of the clergy, says

Alas, I'm very shame, some cannot decline their name
For to can't can't ride. And yet will not decline
For to kepe a cure. As wrye as Tom a Thrum

C. J. A. Clout (time Henry VIII)

Tom o' Bedlam, a ticket-of-leave madman from Bethlehem Hospital, or one discharged as incurable

Tom of Ten Thousand, Thomas Thynne, so called from his great wealth. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but why, the then dean has not thought fit to leave on record

Tom the Piper, one of the characters in the ancient morris-dance, represented with a tabour, tabour-stick, and pipe. He carried a sword and shield, to denote his rank as a "squire minstrel." His shoes were brown, his hose red and "gimp-thighed," his hat or cap red, turned up with yellow, and adorned with a feather, his doublet blue, the sleeves being turned up with yellow, and he wore a yellow cape over his shoulders (See MORRIS-DANCE)

Tom's, a noted coffee-house in Birch Lane, the usual rendezvous of young merchants at 'Change time

Tomahourich (Muhme Janet of), an old sibyl, aunt of Robin Oig McCombie the Highland drover—Sir W. Scott, The Two Drovers (time, George III)

Tom'aln, a valiant fairy knight, kinsman of King Oberon. Tom'aln is not the same as "Tom Thumb," as we are generally but erroneously told, for in the "mighty combat" Tom'aln braved Pigwiggan, while Tom'lum or Thumb seconded King Oberon. This fairy battle was brought about by the jealousy of Oberon, who considered the attentions of Pigwiggan to Queen Mab were "far too nice"—M. Drayton, Nymphidia (1563-1631)

Tomb (Knight of the), James Earl of Douglas in disguise

His armour was invention y painted so as to represent a skeleton. The ribs being constituted by the corse et and its back, here. The shield represented an owl with its wings spread—a device which was repeated upon the helmet which appeared to be completely covered by an image of the same bird of ill omen. But that which was particularly calculated to excite surprise in the spectator was the great height and thinness of the figure—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous iv (time Henry I)

Tomboy (Priscilla), a self-willed, hoydenish, ill-educated romp, of strong animal spirits, and wholly unconventional. She is a West Indian, left under the guardianship of Barnacle, and sent to London for her education. Miss Priscilla Tomboy lives with Barnacle's brother, old [Nicholas] Cockney, a grocer, where she plays boy-and-girl love with young Walter Cockney, which consists chiefly in pettish quarrels and personal insolence. Subsequently she runs off with Captain Slightly, but the captain behaves well by presenting himself next day to the guardian, and obtaining his consent to marriage—The Romp (adapted from Bickerstaff's Love in the City)

Tomès [Tô-may], one of the five physicians called in by Scannarelle to consult on the malady of his daughter Lucinde (2 syl). Being told that a coachman he was attending was dead and buried, the doctor asserted it to be quite impossible, as the coachman had been ill only six days, and Hippocrates had positively stated that the disorder would not come to its height till the fourteenth day. The five doctors meet in consultation, talk of the town gossip, their medical experience, their visits, anything, in short, except the patient. At length the father enters to inquire what decision they had come to. One says Lucinde must have an emetic, M. Tomès says she must be bled, one says an emetic will be her death, the other that bleeding will infallibly kill her.

M. Tomès: Si vous ne faites saigner tout à l'heure votre fille, c'est une personne morte.

M. Desfontaines: Si vous la faites saigner, elle ne sera pas en vie dans un quart-d'heure.

And they quit the house in great anger (act ii 4) —Molière, L'Amour Médecin (1665)

N. Tonès liked correctness in medical practice —Macaulay

Tomkins (Joseph), secret emissary of Cromwell. He was formerly Philip Hazeldine, alias Master Fibbet, secretary to colonel Desborough (one of the parliamentary commissioners) —Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Tom'yris, queen of the Massagette. She defeated Cyrus, who had invaded her kingdom, and, having slain him, threw his head into a vessel filled with human blood, saying, "It was blood you thirsted for, now take your fill!"

Ton-Iosal was so heavy and unwieldy that when he sat down it took the whole force of a hundred men to set him upright on his feet again —The Fiona

If Fion was remarkable for his stature In weight all yielded to the celebrated Ton-Iosal —J. Macpherson Disertation on Ossian

Ton-Thena ("fire of the wave"), a remarkable star which guided Lathion to Ireland, as mentioned in Ossian's Tem'ora, ii, and called in Cathlin of Clutha, "the red traveller of the clouds"

Tonio, a young Tyrolese, who saved Maria, the suttler-girl, when on the point of falling down a precipice. The two, of course, fall in love with each other, and the regiment, which had adopted the suttler-girl, consents to their marriage, provided Tonio will enlist under its flag. No sooner is this done than the marchioness of Berkenfield lays claim to Maria as her daughter, and removes her to the castle. In time, the castle is besieged and taken by the very regiment into which Tonio had enlisted, and, as Tonio had risen to the rank of a French officer, the marchioness consents to his marriage with her daughter —Donizetti, La Figma del Reggimento (1840)

Tonna (Mrs), Charlotte Elizabeth (1792-1846)

Tonto (Don Cherubim), canon of Toledo, the weakest mortal in the world, though, by his smirking air, you would judge him a wit. When he hears a delightful performance read, he listens with such attention as seems full of intelligence, but all the while he understands nothing of the matter —Lesage, Gil Blas, v 12 (1724)

Tonton, the smallest dog that ever existed. When the three princes of a certain king were sent to procure the tiniest dog they could find as a present to their aged father, the White Cat gave the youngest of them a dog so small that it was packed in wadding in a common acorn shell.

As soon as the acorn was opened they all saw a little dog hid in cotton and so small it might jump through a finger ring without touching it. It was a mixture of several colours. Its ears and long hair reached to the ground. The prince set it on the ground and forthwith the tiny creature began to dance a saraland with castanets. —Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1632).

Tony Lumpkin, a young booby, fond of practical jokes and low company. He was the son of Mrs. Hardcastle by her first husband —Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer (1773)

Toodle, engine-fireman, an honest fellow, very proud of his wife Polly and her family.

Polly Toodle, known by the name of Richards, wife of the stoker. Polly was an apple-faced woman, and was mother of a large apple-faced family. This jolly, homely, kind-hearted matron was selected as the nurse of Paul Dombey, and soon became devotedly attached to Paul and his sister Florence.

Robin Toodle, known as "The Biler" or "Rob the Grinder," eldest son of Mrs. Toodle wet-nurse of Paul Dombey. Mr. Dombey gets Robin into an institution called "The Charitable Grinders," where the worst part of the boy's character is freely developed. Robin becomes a sneak, and enters the service of James Carker, manager of the firm of Dombey and Son. On the death of Carker, Robin enters the service of Miss Lucetta Tox —C. Dickens, Dombey and Son (1816)

Tooley Street, London, a corruption of St. Olaf. Similarly, Taudry is a corruption of St. Audrey, St. Tibs of St. Ubes, and St. Telders of St. Ethelred.

Toom Tabard ("empty jacket"), a nickname given to John Balliol, because his appointment to the sovereignty of Scotland was an empty name. He had the royal robe or jacket, but nothing else (1259, 1292-1314)

Tooth (A Wolf's). At one time a wolf's tooth was worn as an amulet by children to charm away fear.

Tooth Worshipped (A) The people of Ceylon worship the tooth of an elephant, those of Malabar the tooth of a monkey. The Siamese once offered a Portuguese 700,000 ducats for the redemption of a monkey's tooth.

Tooth-picks The Romans used tooth-picks made of mastix wood in preference to quills, hence Rabelais says that prince Gargantua "picked his teeth with mastix tooth-pickers" (s'escuroit les dents avecques ung tron de lentisee), bk. 1. 23.

*Lentiscum masticæ sed si tibi fronder curpis

Martial, Epigramm. xx. 24.

Toots (Mr), an innocent, warm-hearted young man, just burst from the bonds of Dr Blimher's school, and deeply in love with Florence Dombey. He is famous for blushing, refusing what he longs to accept, and for saying, "Oh, it is of no consequence." Being very nervous, he never appears to advantage, but in the main "there were few better fellows in the world."

I assure you "said Mr Toots, really I am dreadfully sorry but I s of no consequence"—C. Dickens. Dombey and Son xxviii. (1857).

Topas (Sir), a native of Popervng, in Flanders, a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner. Chaucer calls him "sir Topas" (q. v.)

Topas (Sir) Sir Charles Dilke was so called by the Army and Navy Gazette, November 25, 1871 (1810-1869).

Topham (Master Charles), usher of the black rod—Sir W. Scott, Peccul of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

To'phet, "the place of drums," from toph ("a drum"). So called in allusion to the drums and timbrels sounded in the valley of Hinnom to drown the cries of children sacrificed to this idol. Solomon introduced the worship, and built a temple to Moloch on the Mount of Olives, "that opprobrious hill" (1 Kings xi. 7). The valley of Hinnom is called Gehenna, and is made in the New Testament a "type of hell."

Mrs Beecher Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852)

Tor (Sir), the natural son of king Pellinore and the wife of Aries the cowherd. He was the first of the knights of the Pound Table—Sir T. Malor, History of Prince Arthur, i. 24 (1470).

Toralva (The licentiate), mounted on a cane, was conveyed through the air with his eyes shut, in twelve hours he arrived at Rome, and the following morning returned to Madrid. During his flight he opened his eyes once, and found himself so near the moon that he could have touched it with his finger—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. iii. 5 (1615) (See TOPPANA).

Torch-Race On the eve of the Panathenæa, there was a torch-race in ancient Greece, in which the runners were expected in succession to carry a lighted torch without allowing the flame to become extinguished. Each passed it in turn, and each received it. Plato (Leg., vi.) compares the transmission of life to a torch-race, and Lucretius has the same idea—"It quasi cursores vitæ lampada tradunt" (De Perun Natura, ii. 77). Thomas Moore says the nations of Europe caught up the love of liberty from England, as the runners in a torch-race handed the lighted brand from one to another (See Lempriere, art. "Promethæus").

As at old games a runner snatched the torch

R. Browning Paracelsus II.

Twas like a torch race, such as they
Of Greece performed in ages gone,
When the feet youths, in long array
Passed the bright torch triumphant on,
I saw the expectant nations stand
To catch the coming flame in turn
I saw from ready hand to hand,
The clear but struggling glory burn.

T. Moore The Torch of Liberty (1814).

Torquato, that is, Torquato Tasso, the Italian poet, author of Jerusalem Delivered (1544–1595). After the publication of his great epic, Tasso lived in the court of Ferrara, and conceived a violent passion for Leonora, one of the duke's sisters, but fled, in 1577, to Naples.

Torquil of the Oak, foster-father of Echin M'lan. He was chief of the clan Quhele, and had eight sons, the finest men in the clan. Torquil was a seer, who was supposed to have communication with the invisible world, and he declared a demon had told him that Echin or Hector M'lan was the only man in the two hostile clans of Chattan and Quhele who would come off scathless in the approaching combat (ch. xxvi).—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

A parallel combat is described in The

Cid. When Sancho of Castile was stabbed by Bellido of Zamora, Diego Ordoñez, of the house of Lara, challenged five of the knights of Zamora to single combat. Don Arias Gonzalo and his four sons accepted the challenge. Pedro Arias was first slain, then his brother Diego. Next came Herman, who received a mortal wound, but struck the charger of Diego Ordoñez. The charger, furious with pain, carried its rider beyond the lists, and the combat was declared to be drawn.

Torralba (Dr), carried by the spirit Cequel from Valladolid to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. He was tried by the Inquisition for sorcery (time, Charles V.).—Joseph de Ossa, Pellicier (seventeenth century) (See TORRALBA).

Torre (Sir), son of Sir Bernard, baron of Astolat. His brother was Sir Lavaine, and his sister Elaine "the lily maid of Astolat." He was blunt-mannered, but not without kindness of heart.—Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Elaine").

The word "Torre" is a blunder for Tirre. Sir Torre or Tor, according to Arthurian legend, was the natural son of Pellinore king of Wales, "begotten on Arles' wife, the cowherd" (pt. II. 108). It was Sir Tirre who was the brother of Elaine (pt. III. 122).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Torrismond, general of the forces of Aragon. He falls in love with Leonora, the usurping queen, promised in marriage to Bertran prince of the blood-royal, but she falls in love with Torrismond, who turns out to be the son of Sancho the deposed king. Ultimately, Sancho is restored, and Leonora is married to Torrismond.—Dryden, The Spanish Fryar (1680).

Of league.

S Butler Duallbras II. 2 (1665)

Touch, quality "Of noble touch," of noble quality. The reference is to the touchstone by which gold is tried. Gold articles made according to the rules of alloy are called of "a true touch." The "touch of Paris" is spoken of in 1300. "Laquelle touche passe tous les ors dont l'on œuvre en tous pays." In 1597 two goldsmiths were sentenced to the pillory for making false plate and counterfeiting "her majesty's touch."

The lapis Lydius or touchstone is touched by the gold, and leaves a mark behind, the colour of which indicates its purity.

Gold is tried by the touchstone and men by gold—Bacon.

Touchet [Too-shay] When Charles IX introduced Henri of Navarre to Marie Touchet, the witty Navarrese made this anagram on her name, Je charme tout

Touchfaucet (Captain), in Pierochole's army, taken captive by friar John. Being presented to Grangousier and asked the cause of his king's invasion, he replied, "To avenge the injury done to the cake-bakers of Lernè" (ch 25, 26). Grangousier commanded his treasurer to give the friar 62,000 saluts (£15,500) in reward, and to Touchfaucet he gave "an excellent sword of a Vienne blade, with a gold scabbard, and a collar of gold weighing 702,000 merks (576,000 ounces), garnished with precious stones, and valued at £16,000 sterling, by way of present." Returning to king Pierochole, he advised him to capitulate, whereupon Rashealf cried aloud, "Unhappy the prince who has traitors for his counsellors!" and Touchfaucet, drawing "his new sword," ran him through the body. The king demanded who gave him the sword, and being told the truth, ordered his guards "to hew him in pieces"—Rabelais, Gargantua, i 45-47 (1533)

Touching for the King's Evil. It is said that scrofulous diseases were at one time very prevalent in the island, and that Edward the Confessor, in answer to earnest prayer, was told it would be cured by the royal touch. Edward, being gifted with this miraculous power, transmitted it as an heirloom to his successors. Henry VII presented each person touched with a small coin, called a touch-piece or touch-penny.

Charles II of England, during his reign, touched as many as 92,107 persons, the smallest number (2983) being in the year 1669, and the largest number in 1684, when many were trampled to death (see Macaulay's History of England, 214). In these "touchings," John Brown, a royal surgeon, superintended the ceremony (See Macbeth, act iv sc 3).

Prince Charles Edward, who claimed to be prince of Wales, touched a female child for the disease in 1745.

The French kings claimed the same divine power from Anne of Clovis, A.D. 481. And on Easter Sunday, 1686, Louis XIV touched 1600, using these words, Le roy te touche, Dieu te guerisse.

* * Dr Johnson was the last person touched. The touch-piece given to him has on one side this legend, Soli Deo gloria, and on the other side, Anna D G M BR F et H REG ("Anne, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, queen").

Our good Edward be the Confessor and king twixt the throat and jaws he remedy nor cause
by earnest prayer

This tumour by a king might cur'd be alone
Which he an heirloom left unto the English throne
Dryden Polyolbion xi. (1613)

Touching Glasses in drinking healths

When prince Charles passed over into France, after the failure of the expedition in 1715 his supporters were beset with spies on every hand. It so happened that occasionally in society they were necessitated to drink the king's health but it was tacitly understood that the king "was not king George but the king over the water." To express this symbolically one glass was passed over another and later down the foot of one glass was touched against the rim of another—Notes and Queries of New York, October 18.3

Touchstone, a clown filled with "quips and cranks and wanton wiles." The original of this character was Tar-ton, the favourite court jester of queen Elizabeth —Shakespeare, As You Like It (1s98)

His famous speech is "the seven degrees of affront" (1) the retort courteous, (2) the quip modest, (3) the reply churlish, (4) the reproof valiant, (5) the counter-check quarrelsome, (6) the lie circumstantial, and (7) the lie direct (act v se 4)

Tarleton (1530-1588) was inimitable in such parts as Launcelot in the Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare) and Touchstone "For these clowns parts he never had an equal and never will have —Baker Chronicles

Touchwood (Colonel), "the most passionate, impatient, unreasonable, good-natured man in Christendom" Uncle of major and Clarissa Touchwood

Sophia Touchwood, the colonel's daughter, in love with her cousin, major Touchwood Her father wants her to marry colonel Clifford, but the colonel has fixed his heart on Clarissa, the major's sister

Major Touchwood, nephew of colonel Touchwood, and in love with his cousin Sophia, the colonel's daughter He fancied that colonel Clifford was his rival, but Clifford was in love with Clarissa, the major's sister This error forms the plot of the farce, and the mistakes which arise when the major dresses up to pass himself off for his uncle constitute its fun and entanglement

Clarissa Touchwood, the major's sister, in love with colonel Clifford They first met at Brighton, and the colonel thought her Christian name was Sophia, hence the major looked on him as a rival —T Dibdin, What Next?

Touchwood (Lord), uncle of Mellefont (2 syl)

Lady Touchwood his wife, sister of sir Paul Plunk She entertains a criminal passion for her nephew Mellefont, and, because he repels her advances, vows to ruin him Accordingly, she tells her husband that the young man has sought to dishonour her, and when his lordship fancies that the statement of his wife must be greatly overstated, he finds Mellefont with lady Touchwood in her own private chamber This seems to corroborate the accusation laid to his charge, but it was an artful trick of Maskwell's to make mischief, and in a short time a conversation which he overhears between lady Touchwood and Maskwell reveals the infamous scheme most fully to him —Congreve, The Double (1700)

(Lord and lady Touchwood must not be mistaken for sir George and lady Frances Touchwood, which are very different characters)

Their Wildair, sir John Brutes, lady Touchwoods and Mrs. Frails are conventional reproductions of those wild gallants and demireps which figure in the licentious dramas of Dryden and Shadwell —Sir W Scott, The Drama.

* * "Wildair," in The Constant Couple, by Farquhar, "Brute," in The Provoked Wife, by Vanbrugh, "Mrs Frail," in Love for Love, by Congreve

Touchwood (Sir George), the loving husband of lady Frances, desperately jealous of her, and wishing to keep her out of all society, that she may not lose her native simplicity and purity of mind Sir George is a true gentleman of most honourable feelings

Lady Frances Touchwood, the sweet, innocent wife of sir George Touchwood Before her marriage she was brought up in seclusion in the country, and sir George tries to keep her fresh and pure in London —Mrs Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem (1780)

The calm and lovely innocence of lady Touchwood could by nobody be so happily represented as by this actress (Mrs Hartley 1751-18-4) —T Davies.

Touchwood (Peregrine), a touchy old East Indian, a relation of the Mowbray family —Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Tough (Mr), an old harrister —Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Touran The death of the children of Touran forms one of the three tragic stories of the ancient Irish The other two are The Death of the Children of Ivr, and The Death of the Children of Usnach

Tournemine (3 syl), a Jesuit of the eighteenth century, fond of the marvellous "Il aimait le merveilleux et ne renonçait qu'avec peine à y croire"

Il ressemble à Tournemine
Il croit ce qu'il imagine.

French Proverb

Tours, in France, according to fable, is so called from Turonès, a nephew of Brute the mythical king of Britain

In the party of Brutus was one Turones his nephew inferior to none in courage and strength from whom Tours derived its name being the place of his sepulture —Geoffrey of Monmouth British History (1142)

Touthope (Mr), a Scotch attorney and clerk of the peace —Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Towel (An Oaken), a cudgel "To be rubbed down with an oaken towel" is to be well beaten

She ordered the fellow to be drawn through a horre-pond, and then to be well rubbed down with an oaken towel.—The Adventure of My Aunt.

Tower of Hunger (The), Gualandi, the tower in which Ugolino with his two sons and two grandsons were starved to death in 1288 —Dante, Inferno (1300)

Tower of London (The) was really built by Gundulphus bishop of Rochester, in the reign of William I, but tradition ascribes it to Julius Caesar

Ye towers of Julius, London's lasting shame
Gray The Bard (1757)

Tower of Vathek, built with the intention of reaching heaven, that Vathek might pry into the secrets seen by Mahomet. The staircase contained 11,000 stairs, and when the top was gained men looked no bigger than pygmies, and cities seemed mere bee-hives —Beckford, Vathek (1784)

Townley Mysteries, certain religious dramas, so called because the MS containing them belonged to P Townley. These dramas are supposed to have been acted at Widkirk Abbey, in Yorkshire. In 1831 they were printed for the Surtees Society, under the editorship of the Rev Joseph Hunter and J Stevenson (See COVENTRY MYSTERIES)

Townly (Colonel), attached to Berinthia, a handsome young widow, but in order to win her he determines to excite her jealousy, and therefore pretends love to Amanda, her cousin. Amanda, however, repels his attentions with disdain, and the colonel, seeing his folly, attaches himself to Berinthia —Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777)

Townly (Lord), a nobleman of generous mind and high principle, liberal and manly. Though very fond of his wife, he insists on a separation, because she is so extravagant and self-willed. Lady Townly sees, at length, the folly of her ways, and promises amendment, whereupon the husband relents, and receives her into favour again.

The London critics acknowledged that J G Holman's lord Townly "was the perfection of the nobleman of the days of Chesterfield. He was not the actor but the dignified lord himself —Donaldson.

Lady Townly, the gay but not unfaithful young wife of lord Townly, who thinks that the pleasure of life consists in gambling, she "cares nothing for her husband," but "loves almost everything he hates." She says

I dote upon assemblies, my heart bounds at a ball and at an opera I expire. Then I love play to distraction, cards enchant me, and dice put me out of my little wits.

—Vanbrugh and Cibber, The Provoked Husband III. 1 (1723)

The part which at once established her [Miss Farren's] fame as an actress was "lady Townly" —the whole house was enraptured.—Memoir of Elizabeth Countess of Derby (1822)

(Mrs Pritchard, Margaret Woffington, Miss Brunton, Miss M. Tree, and Miss E. Tree were all excellent in this favourite part)

Tox (Miss Lueretia), the bosom friend of Mr Dombey's married sister (Mrs Chick). Miss Lueretia was a faded lady, "as if she had not been made in fast colours," and was washed out. She "ambled through life without any opinions, and never abandoned herself to unavailing regrets." She greatly admired Mr Dombey, and entertained a forlorn hope that she might be selected by him to supply the place of his deceased wife. Miss Tox lived in Princess Place, and maintained a weak flirtation with a major Bagstock, who was very jealous of Mr Dombey —C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Tozer, one of the ten young gentlemen in the school of Dr Blumber when Paul Dombey was there. A very solemn lad, whose "shirt-collar curled up the lobes of his ears" —C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Trabb, a prosperous old bachelor, a tailor by trade.

He was having his breakfast in the parlour behind the shop. He had sliced his hot roll into three feather beds, and was slipping butter in between the blankets. He was a prosperous old bachelor and his open window looked into a prosperous little garden and orchard, and there was a prosperous iron safe let into the wall at the side of the fireplace and without doubt heaps of his prosperity were put away in it in bags.—C Dickens, Great Expectations xix. (1860)

Tracy, one of the gentlemen in the earl of Sussex's train —Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Traddles, a simple, honest young man, who believes in everybody and everything. Though constantly failing, he is never depressed by his want of success. He had the habit of brushing his hair up on end, which gave him a look of surprise.

At the Creakle's school when I was miserable, he [Traddles] would lay his head on the desk for a little while and then cheering up would draw skeletons all over his slate.—C Dickens, David Copperfield viii. (1843).

Trade'love (Mr), a broker on 'Change, one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the hearse. He was "a fellow that would out-lie the devil for the advantage of stock, and cheat his own father in a bargain. He was a great stockler for trade, and hated every one that wore a sword" (act 1 1) Colonel Feignwell passed himself off as a Dutch merchant named Jan van Timtamtire-leretta herr van Feignwell, and made a bet with Tradelove Tradelove lost, and cancelled the debt by giving his consent to the marriage of his ward to the supposed Dutchman — Mrs Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717)

Trafford (F G), the pseudonym of Mrs C L Riddell, before the publication of George Geith

Tragedy (Father of Greek), Thespis, the Richardson of Athens Æschylus is also called "The Father of Greek Tragedy" (n c 525-426)

Tragedy (The Father of French), Garnier (1534-1590)

Tragedy (The First English), Gorboduc, by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville (1569) The first comedy was Ralph Roister Doister, by Nicholas Udall (1561)

Thorabury says the coadjutor of Norton was lord Buckhurst, and Charles Lamb maintains that lord Buckhurst "supplied the more vital parts," but professor Craik says Sackville was the worker together with Norton

Trained Band, the volunteer artillery, whose ground for practice was in Moorfields John Gilpin was "captain of the band"

A Trained Band captain who was he
Of famous London town.
Cowper John Gilpin (1789).

Trajan (The Second), Marcus Aurelius Claudius, surnamed Gothicus, noted for his valour, justice, and goodness (215, 268-270)

Trajan and St. Gregory It is said that Trajan, although unbaptized, was delivered from hell in answer to the prayers of St Gregory

There was storied on the rock
The exalted glory of the Roman prince
Whose mighty worth moved Gregory to earn
His mighty conquest—Trajan the emperor
Dante Purgatory xl (1308)

Trajan and the Importunate Widow One day, a mother appeared before the emperor Trajan, and cried, "Grant vengeance, sir! My son is murdered" The emperor replied, "I cannot stop now, wait till I return" "But, sire," pleaded the widow, "if you do not return, who will grant me justice?" "My successor," said Trajan "And Trajan leave to another the duty that he himself is appointed to perform?" On hearing this, the emperor stopped his cavalcade, heard the woman's cause, and granted her suit Dante tells this tale in his Purgatory, xi — John of Salisbury, Polycraticus de Curialium Nugis, v 8 (twelfth century)

Dion Cassius (Roman History, lxxix) tells the same story of Hadrian When a woman appeared before him with a suit as he was starting on a journey, the emperor put her off, saying, "I have no leisure now" She replied, "If Hadrian has no leisure to perform his duties, let him cease to reign!" On hearing this reproof, he dismounted from his horse, and gave ear to the woman's cause

A woman once made her appeal to Philip of Macedon, who, being busy at the time, petulantly exclaimed, "Woman, I have no time now for such matters" "If Philip has no time to render justice," said the woman, "then is it high time for Philip to resign!" The king felt the rebuke, heard the cause patiently, and decided it justly

Tramecksan and Slamecksan, the High-heels and Low-heels, two great political factions of Lilliput The animosity of these Guelphs and Ghibellines of punydom ran so high "that no High-heel would eat or drink with a Low-heel, and no Low-heel would salute or speak to a High-heel" The king of Lilliput was a High-heel, but the heir-apparent a Low-heel — Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," iv, 1726)

Tramp (Gaffer), a peasant at the execution of old Meg Murdochson — Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Tramtrist (Sir), the name assumed by sir Tristram when he went to Ireland to be cured of his wounds after his combat with sir Marhaus Here La Belle Isold (or Isold "the Fair") was his leech, and the young knight fell in love with her When the queen discovered that sir Tramtrist was sir Tristram, who had killed her brother, sir Marhaus, in combat, she plotted to take his life, and he was obliged to leave the island La Belle Isold subsequently married king Mark of Cornwall, but her heart was ever fixed on her brave young patient — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii 9-12 (1470)

Tranchera, Agricane's sword, which afterwards belonged to Brandimart — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Tia'mio, one of the servants of Lucentio the gentleman who marries Bianca (the sister of Katharina "the Paduan shrew") — Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Transfer, a usurer, who is willing to advance sir George Wealthy a sum of money on these easy terms (1) 5 per cent interest, (2) 10 per cent premium, (3) 5 per cent for insuring the young man's life, (4) a handsome present to himself as broker, (5) the borrower to pay all expenses, and (6) the loan not to be in cash but goods, which are to be taken at a valuation and sold at auction at the borrower's sole hazard. These terms are accepted, and sir George promises besides a handsome douceur to Loader for having found a usurer so promptly — Foote, The Minor (1760)

Transformations In the art of transformation, one of the most important things was a ready wit to adopt in an instant some form which would give you an advantage over your adversary, thus, if your adversary appeared as a mouse, you must change into an owl, then your adversary would become an arrow to shoot the owl, and you would assume the form of fire to burn the arrow, whereupon your adversary would become water to quench the fire, and he who could outwit the other would come off victorious. The two best examples I know of this sort of contest are to be found, one in the Arabian Nights, and the other in the Mabinochion.

The former is the contest between the Queen of Beauty and the son of the daughter of Eblis. He appeared as a scorpion, she in a moment became a serpent, whereupon he changed into an eagle, she into a more powerful black eagle, he became a cat, she a wolf, she instantly changed into a worm and crept into a pomegranite, which in time burst, whereupon he assumed the form of a cock to devour the seed, but it became a fish, the cock then became a pike, but the princess became a blazing fire, and consumed her adversary before he had time to change — "The Second Calender"

The other is the contest between Caridwen and Gwion Bach. Bach fled as a hare, she changed into a greyhound, whereupon he became a fish, she an otter-bitch, he instantly became a bird, she a hawk, but he became as quick as thought a grain of wheat. Caridwen now became a hen, and made for the wheat-corn and devoured him — "Talesin"

Translator - General Plunk non Holland is so called by Fuller, in his Worthies of England. Mr Holland translated Livy, Pliny, Plutarch, Suetonius, Xenophon, and several other classic authors (1551-1636)

Trap to Catch a Sunbeam, by Matilda Anne Planché (afterwards Mrs Mackarness)

Trapbois (Old), a miser in Alsatia. Even in his extreme age, "he was believed to understand the plucking of a pigeon better than any man in Alsatia"

Martha Trapbois, the miser's daughter, a cold, decisive, masculine woman, who marries Richie Moniphes — Sir W. Scott, The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Trap'oban (The Island of), ruled over by Alifanfaron. It is in the Utopian Ocean, 92° N lat., 180° 2' W long. — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I in 4 (1605)

Trapper (The) Natty Bumppo is so called in The Prairie. He is introduced in four other of Cooper's novels as "The Deerslayer," "The Pathfinder," "The Hawk-eye" in The Last of the Mohicans, and "Natty Bumppo" in The Pioneers

Traveller (The) The scheme of this poem is very simple. The poet supposes himself seated among Alpine solitudes, looking down upon a hundred kingdoms. He would fain find some spot where happiness can be attained, but the natives of each realm think their own the best, yet the amount of happiness in each is pretty well equal. To illustrate this, the poet describes the manners and government of Italy, Switzerland, France, Holland, and England — O Goldsmith (1764)

Traveller (Mr), the stranger who tried to reason with Mr Mopes and bring him back to society, but found the truth of the tinker's remark, "When iron is thoroughly rotten, you cannot botch it" — C Dickens, A Christmas Number (1861)

Traveller's Refuge, the valley of Fakreddin — W Beekford, Vathek (1784)

Travellers' Tales Marco Polo says, "Certain islands lie so far north in the Northern Ocean, that one going thither actually leaves the pole-star a trifle behind to the south"

A Dutch skipper told Master Moxon, the hydrographer of Charles II, that he had himself sailed two degrees beyond the pole

Maunderville says, in Prester John's country is a sea of sand which ebbs and flows in great waves without one drop of water. This sea, says the knight of St Alban's, men find full of right good fish of most delicious eating

At the time of the discovery of America or Columbus, many marvellous tales were rife in Spain. It was said that in one part of the coast of El Nombre de Dios, the natives had such long ears that one ear served for bed and the other for counterpane. This reminds one of Gweyl mah Gwestrd, one of whose lips hung down to his waist, and the other covered his head like a cowl (see p. 1000). Another tale was that one of the crew of Columbus had come across a people who lived on sweet scents alone, and were killed by foul smells. This invention was hardly original, inasmuch as both Plutarch and Pliny tell us of an Indian people who lived on sweet odours, and Democritus lived for several days on the mere effluvia of hot bread (see p. 698). Another tale was that the noses of these smell-feeders were so huge that their heads were all nose. We are also told of one-eyed men, of men who carried their head under one of their arms, of others whose head was in their breast, of others who were conquered, not by arms, but by the priests holding up before them a little ivory crucifix—a sort of Christian version of the taking of Jericho by the blast of the silver trumpets of the Levites in the time of Joshua.

Travels in Remote Nations, by "Lemuel Gulliver." He is first shipwrecked and cast on the coast of Lilliput, a country of pygmies. Subsequently he is thrown among the people of Brobdingnag, giants of tremendous size. In his third expedition he is driven to Laputa, an empire of quack pretenders to science and unavish projectors. And in his fourth voyage he visits the Houyhnhnms [Wim' n ms], where horses were the dominant powers.—Dean Swift (1726)

Travers, a retainer of the earl of Northumberland.—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV (1598)

Travers (Sir Edmund), an old bachelor, the guardian and uncle of Lady Davenant. He is a tedious gossip, fond of meddling, prosy, and wise in his own conceit. "It is surprising," he says, "how unwilling people are to hear my stories. When in parliament I make a speech, there is nothing but coughing, hemming, and shuffling of feet—no desire of information." By his instigation, the match was broken off between his niece and captain Dormer, and she was given in marriage to lord Davenant, but it turned out that his lordship was already married, and his wife living.—Cumberland, The Mysterious Husband (1783)

Traviata, an opera, representing the progress of a courtesan. Music by Verdi, and libretto from La Dame aux Camelias, a novel by Alexandre Dumas fils (1856)

Treachery of the Long-Knives (The). Hengist invited the chief British nobles to a conference at Ambresbury, but arranged that a Saxon should be seated beside each Briton. At a given signal, each Saxon was to slay his neighbour with his long knife, and as many as 160 British nobles fell. Lidiol earl of Gloucester escaped, after killing seventy (some say 660) of the Saxons.—Welsh Triads

Stonehenge was erected by Merlin at the command of Ambrosin in memory of the plot of the Long-Knives. He built it on the site of a former circle. It dates from older battle circles as may be seen by comparing it with Anebry Station Drew Keswick, etc.—Cambrian History by art. Merdin

Treasury of Peru (The), the Andes

Treasury of Sciences (The), Bokhara, which has 103 colleges, besides schools and 360 mosques

Trecentisti, the Italian worthies of the "Trecento" (thirteenth century). They were Dante (1265-1321), Petrarch (1304-1374), Boccaccio, who wrote the Decameron. Others of less note were Giotto, Giovanni da Pisa, and Andrea Orcagna. (See CINQUECENTO, SEICENTO)

In Italy he d'ape the Trecentist.
Byron Don Juan III 66 (1809)

Tree (The Bleeding). One of the indictments laid to the charge of the marquis of Argyll, so hated by the royalists for the part he took in the execution of Montrose, was this: "That a tree on which thirty-six of his enemies were hanged was immediately blasted, and when hewn down, a copious stream of blood ran from it, saturating the earth, and that blood for several years was emitted from the roots."—Laing, History of Scotland, II 11 (1800), State Trials, II, 422

Tree (The Largest) The largest tree in the world is said to be one discovered, in 1874, near Tule River, in California. Though the top has been broken off, it is 240 feet high, and the diameter of the tree where it has been broken is 12 feet. This giant of the forest is called "Old Moses," from a mountain in the neighbourhood, and is calculated to be 4810 years old! The hollow of its trunk, which is 111 feet, will hold 150 persons, and is hung with scenes of California, is carpeted, and fitted up like a drawing-room, with table, chairs, sofa, and pianoforte. A section of this tree, 74 feet round and 2½ feet across, was exhibited in New York in 1879.—See New York Herald. Australia however, claims to have still larger trees.

Tree (The Poet's), a tree which grows over the tomb of Tan-Sen, a musician at the court of [Mohammed] Akbar. Whoever chews a leaf of this tree will be inspired with a divine melody of voice.—W. Hunter.

His voice was as sweet as if he had chewed the leaves of that enchanted tree which grows over the tomb of the musician Tan-Sen.—Moore Lalla Rookh (1817).

Tree (The Singing), a tree each leaf of which was musical, and all the leaves joined together in delightful harmony.—Arabian Nights ("The Story of the Sisters who envied their Younger Sister").

In the Fairy Tales of the comtesse D'Aunoy, there is a tree called "the singing apple," of precisely the same character, but the apple tree gave the possessor the inspiration of poetry also.—"Chery and Fairstar."

Tree of Liberty (The), a tree or pole crowned with a cap of liberty, and decorated with flags, ribbons, and other devices of a republican character. The idea was given by the Americans in their War of Independence; it was adopted by the Jacobins in Paris in 1790, and by the Italians in 1818.

Tree of Life (The), a tree in the "midst of the garden" of paradise, which, if Adam had plucked and eaten of, he would have "lived for ever"—Gen ii 9, iii 22.

Out of the fertile ground [God] cause I to grow
All trees of noblest kind for slight smell taste;
And all amid them stood the Tree of Life
High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruit
Of vegetable gold.

Milton Paradise Lost iv 215 etc (1667)

Tree of Knowledge (The), a tree in the garden of paradise, the fruit of which Adam and Eve were forbidden to eat, "lest they died"—Gen ii 9, iii 3.

Next to the tree of Life,
the Tree of Knowledge grew fast by Knowledge of good, bought dear by knowing ill.
Milton Paradise Lost iv 11 (1667)

Trees noted for Specific Virtues and Uses

Those articles marked B P are from William Browne's Britannia's Pastorals (1613)

ALDER, good for water-pipes and piles, capital for the foundations of buildings situated upon bogs, it becomes black as jet and almost imperishable when used for piles in swamps or under water. The Rialto of Venice is founded on alder. It is excellent for clogs, shoe-heels, wooden shoes, caps for mill-wheels, turnery, chairs, poles, and garden props.

It is said that the dislike it alder nourishes whatever plant grows in its shadow.—B P

ASU, the Venus of the forest.—Gilpin, Forest Scenery (1791)

Used for all tools employed in husbandry, carts, waggons, wheels, pulleys, and oars. It bursts into leaf between May 13 and June 14.

Grass will grow beneath it.

At Donirey, near Clare, is the hollow trunk of an ash tree 42 feet in circumference, in which a little school used to be kept.—A. Young, Irish Tour (1775-6)

In Woburn Park is an ash tree 90 feet high, 15 feet in girth (8 feet from the ground), and containing a grand total of 872 cubic feet of timber.—Strutt, Sylvia Britannica

The ash tree at Carnock, planted in 1596, supposed to be the largest in Scotland, is 90 feet high and 14 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground).—Ditto

Dr Walker says he measured an ash tree in Lochaber churchyard, Scotland, 58 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground)

ASPERULUS. No grass will grow in its vicinity. The legend is that the cross of Jesus was made of this wood, and hence its leaves were doomed to tremble till the day of doom.

Ah! tremble tremble aspen tree!
We need not ask thee why thou shakest
For if as holy legend saith
On thee the Saviour bled to death
No wonder aspen that thou quakest!
And till in judgment all assemble Thy leaves accursed shall wall and tremble.

L. C. R.

BRECH TREE, employed for clogs, tool handles, planes, mallets, turnery, large wooden screws, sounding-boards of musical instruments, scabbards, band-boxes, book-covers, coffins, chairs, and bedsteads, but for chairs and bedsteads it is not fit, as it is a favourite resort of the pinus pectinicornis, whose eggs are deposited on the surface of the wood, and the young worms eat their way in. Boats for nets are made of the bark. It is excellent for wood fires, and is called in France bois d'Audelle. The beech bursts into leaf between April 19 and May 7.

"The Twelve Apostles." On an island of the lake Wetter, were twelve majestic beech trees, now reduced to eleven, for a zealous peasant cut down one of them, declaring "that the traitor Judas should have no part nor lot with the faithful." On these beeches are cut the names of Charles XI, Charles XII, queen Eleonora, and other distinguished visitors. Other famous beeches are the Frankley Beeches, in Worcestershire.

Virgil's hawl, drum opus Alcimedontis, was made of beech wood, and Pliny tells us that vessels used in the temples were made sometimes of the same wood.

The beech, like the fir and chestnut, is very destructive of vegetation beneath.

BIRCH, used by the ancients for papyrus. The wood is used for the heels of shoes, cradles, packing-boxes, sabots, drinking-cups, brooms or besoms, rods, torches, and charcoal.

"It supplies the northern peasant with his house, his bread, his wine, and the vessels to put it in, part of his clothing, and the furniture of his bed"—Sylvan Sketches.

Birch loves the coldest places.—B P

BLACKTHORN is formed into teeth for rakes and into walking-sticks. Letters written on linen or woollen with sloe-juice will not wash out.

It is said that Joseph of Arimathea planted his staff on the south ridge of Weary-all Hill (now Werrall), where it grew and put forth blossoms every Christmas Day afterwards. The original tree was destroyed in the reign of Charles I by a puritan soldier, who lost his life by a splinter which wounded him while so employed. The variety which blossoms twice a year is now pretty common.

The Holy Thorn has been introduced into many parts and is now grown in several gardens about Glastonbury and its vicinity. Pilgrimages continued to be made to this tree even in Mr Evelyn's time who died 1721.—Warner Evening Post January 1753.

Box, used for turnery, combs, mathematical instruments, knife-handles, tops, screws, button-moulds, wood engravings. Box wood will sink in water.

A decoction of box wood promotes the growth of hair, and an oil distilled from shavings is a cure for hemorrhoids, tooth-ache, epilepsy, and stomach-worms so we are told.

CIDRUS, used for cigar-boxes. It is hateful to moths and fleas, and hence it is used for lining wardrobes and drawers.

CHERRY TREE, used by the turner, formed into chairs and hoops. It is stained to imitate mahogany, to which wood, both in grain and colour, it approaches nearer than any other of this country. It is stained black for picture-frames. The cherry tree was first introduced from Flanders into Kent, in the reign of Henry VIII.

More than a hundred men during a siege were kept alive for nearly two months, without any other sustenance than a little of this gum taken into the mouth and suffered gradually to dissolve.—Hasselquist Iter Palatinum (1:57).

CHESTNUT TREE, the tree introduced into the pictures of Salvator Rosa. The wood is used by coopers and for water-pipes, because it neither shrinks nor changes the colour of any liquor it contains. It is, however, bad for posts, and grass will not grow beneath its shade.

Staves that nor shrink nor swell
The coopers close wrought cask to chestnut-owes.
Bodley.

The roof of Westminster Abbey, and that of the "Parliament House," Edinburgh, are made of chestnut wood.

In Cobham Park, Kent, is a chestnut tree 40 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground).—Strutt, Sylva Britannica.

At Tortworth, in Gloucestershire, is a chestnut tree 52 feet in girth. Even in 1150 it was called "the great chestnut tree of Tortworth." Mr Marsham says it was 540 years old when King John came to the throne, which would carry us back to the heptarchy. If so, this tree has tallied the whole history of England from the Roman period to our own.

The horse chestnut bursts into leaf between March 17 and April 19. The Spanish chestnut fully a month later.

CYPRESS hurts the least of all trees by its droppings.—B P

DOG ROSE. So called by the Greeks (Aunorodon), because the root was deemed a cure for the bite of a mad dog.

ELDER TREE, used for skewers, tops of angling-rods, needles for netting, turnery. The pith is used for electro-meters and in electrical experiments.

An infusion of elder leaves will destroy insects on delicate plants better than tobacco-juice, and if turnips, cabbages, fruit trees, etc., are brushed with a branch of elder leaves, no insect will infest the plants.—Philosophical Transactions, v 62 p 848.

ELM is used for axle-trees, mill-wheels, keels of boats, gunwales, chairs, coffins, rails, gates, underground pipes, pumps, millwork patterns.

Grass will grow beneath its shade.

The elm is pre-eminent for the tenacity of its wood which never splinters. It is the first of forest trees to burst into leaf.

Toads and frogs are often embedded in elm trees. They crept into some hollow place or crack, and became imprisoned by the glutinous fluid of the new inner bark (Uter and albumen). Some have been found alive when the tree is cut down, but they need not have been embedded long.

At Hampstead there was once a famous hollow elm, which had a staircase within and seats at the top—Parl. Topography.

At Blythfield, in Staffordshire, was an elm which, Ray tells us, furnished 2660 feet of planks, weighing 47 tons.

The elm at Chequers, Buckinghamshire, was planted in the reign of Stephen, the shell is now 31 feet in girth. The Chequer-tree in Kent, contains 268 feet of timber, and is 17 feet in girth, it is said to have had an annual fur beneath its shade in the reign of Henry V. The elm at Crawley, in Sussex, is 70 feet high and 85 feet in girth—Strutt, Sylva Britannica.

FIR TREE. The leaves of this tree are the property of maturing game and meat hung amongst them.

IN FUR. In Ireland the bog firs, beaten into string, are manufactured into rope, capable of resisting the weather much longer than hempen ropes. The bark can be used for tan. Tar and pitch are obtained from the trunk and branches. The thinnings of fir forests will do for hop-poles, scantlings, and rafters, and its timber is used by builders.

Grass will not grow beneath fir trees.

GUMMED ROSE. From the bark of the root birdlime is made. The shoots make excellent bands for faggots.

Levin says a decoction of the leaves will dye the hair black and strengthen it.

HAZEL TREE. The wood makes excellent charcoal for forges. Fishing-rods, walking-sticks, crates, hoops for barrels, shoots for springles to fasten down thatch, hurdles, etc., are made of this wood. Hazel chips will clear turbid wine in twenty-four hours, and twigs of hazel twisted together will serve for yeast in brewing.

Hazel wands were used in divination, for detecting minerals, water-springs, and hid treasures (See DOUSTERSWIVEL, p. 270).

By whatever occult virtue the forked hazel is said to cover not only subterraneous treasure, but criminal's guilt of murder at other crimes made out so plainly by the attraction of magistrates and divers other learned and liberal persons who have critically examined matters of fact, is certainly next to a miracle and requires a strong faith.—Levin, 2d ed. (1651).

The small hole bored through the shell of hazel nuts is not the work of squirrels, but of field mice, squirrels always split the shells.

HOLLY TREE. Birdlime is made from it. The wood is used for veneering, handles of knives, cogs for mill-wheels, hones for whetting knives and razors, coachmen's whips, Tunbridge ware.

IVY. The roots are used by leather cutters for whetting their knives, and when the roots are large, boxes and slabs are made from them.

It is said that apricots and peaches protected in winter by ivy fencing become remarkably productive.

LYNCH. is never attacked by worms.—P. P.

The wood is used for veneering, and alcohol or spirits of wine, impregnated with the essential oil of juniper berries, is gin (or juniper water), for the French genieve means "a juniper berry." Ordinary gin is a malt liquor, distilled a second time, with the addition of juniper berries, or more frequently, with the oil of turpentine.

LARCH. very apt to warp, but it resists decay. It bursts into leaf between March 21 and April 14.

Le bois du mélèze l'emporte en bonté et en durée sur celui des pins et des sapins. On en fait des gouttières, les conduits d'eau, souterraines de bonnes et argentes. Il entre dans la construction des petits bâtiments de mer. Les peûdres s'en servent pour faire les cadres de leurs tableaux.—Beauillet, Dict. univ. des sciences.

LIME or LINDEN TREE. Gaining Gibbons, the great carver in wood, used no other wood but that of the lime tree, which is soft, light, smooth, close-grained, and not subject to the worm. For the same reason, it is the chief material of Tunbridge ware. Bellonius states that the Greeks used the wood for making bottles.

Lime wood makes excellent charcoal for gunpowder, and is employed for buttons and leather-cutters' boards. The flowers afford the best honey for bees, and the famous Kow no honey is made exclusively from the linden blossoms.

It was one of the trees from which papyrus was made, and in the library of Vienna is a work of Cicero written on the inner bark of the linden.

One other thing is worth mentioning Hares and rabbits will never injure the bark of this tree

The lime is the first of all trees to shed its leaves in autumn It bursts into leaf between April 6 and May 2

At Decopham, in Norfolk, was a lime tree which, Evelyn tells us, was 36 feet in girth and 90 feet in height Strutt tells us of one in Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 17 feet in girth (3 feet above the ground) and 100 feet high, it contained 875 feet of timber He also mentions one in Cobham Park, 28 feet in girth and 90 feet in height

The lime tree in the Grisons is upwards of 590 years old

MAPLE TREE, employed for cabinet-work, gunstocks, screws for cider presses, and turnery The Tigris and Pantherine tables were made of maple The maple tables of Cicero, Asinius Gallus, king Juba, and the Mauritanian Ptolemy, "are worth their weight in gold"

At Knowle, in Kent, there is a maple tree which is 14 feet in girth—Strutt, Sylva Britannica

MOUNTAIN ASH or ROWAN TREE, used for hoops, and for bows, comes next to the yew It forms good and lasting posts, and is made into hurdles, tables, spokes of wheels, shafts, chairs, and so on The roots are made into spoons and knife-handles The bark makes excellent tan

Twigs of rowan used to be carried about as a charm against witches Scotch dairy-maids drive their cattle with rowan rods, and at Strathspey, in Scotland, at one time, sheep and lambs were made to pass through hoops of rowan wood on May-day

In Wales, the rowan used to be considered sacred, it was planted in church-yards, and crosses made of the wood were commonly worn

Their spells were vain. The hags returned

To the queen in sorrowful mood

Where there is rowan tree wood

The Laidley Worm of Spindleston Heughs

MYRTLE Some northern nations use it instead of hops The cathkins, boiled in water, throw up a waxy scum, of which candles are made by Dutch boers Hot-tentets (according to Thunberg) make a cheese of it Myrtle tan is good for tanning calf-skins

Laid under a bed, it keeps off fleas and moths

OAK TREE, the king of the forest and patriarch of trees, wholly unrivalled in stature, strength, and longevity The timber is used for ship-building, the bark for tanning leather, and the gall for making ink Oak timber is used for every work where durability and strength are required

Oak trees best resist the thunder-stroke—B P (William Browne is responsible for this statement) It bursts into leaf between April 10 and May 26

In 1757 there was an oak in earl Powis's park, near Ludlow, 16 feet in girth (5 feet from the ground) and 60 feet high (Marshall) Panshanger Oak, in Kent, is 19 feet in girth, and contains 1000 feet of timber, though not yet in its prime (Marshall) Salcey Forest Oak, in Northamptonshire, is 24 feet in girth (Marshall) Gog, in Yardley Forest, is 28 feet in girth, and contains 1658 cubic feet of timber The king of Wynnstay Park, North Wales, is 30 feet in girth The Queen's Oak, Huntingfield, Suffolk, from which queen Elizabeth shot a buck, is 35 feet in girth (Marshall) Shelton Oak, near Shrewsbury, called the "Grette Oak" in 1543, which served the great Glendower for a post of observation in the battle of Shrewsbury (1403), is 37 feet in girth (Marshall) Green Dale Oak, near Welbeck, is 38 feet in girth, 11 feet from the ground (Evelyn) Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, is 48 feet in girth (Evelyn) The great oak in Broomfield Wood, near Ludlow, was, in 1764, 68 feet in girth, 23 feet high, and contained 1455 feet of timber (Light-foot)

Beggar's Oak, in Blithfield Park, Staffordshire, contains 827 cubic feet of timber, and, in 1812, was valued at £200 (Marshall) Fredville Oak, Kent, contains 1400 feet of timber (Marshall) But the most stupendous oak ever grown in England was that dug out of Hatfield Bog it was 12 feet in girth at the larger end, 6 feet at the smaller end, and 120 feet in length, so that it exceeded the famous larch tree brought to Rome in the reign of Tiberius, as Pliny states in his Natural History

(These are all from Marshall's Bath Soc., i, the Sylva Caledonia, Evelyn's Sylva, The Journal of a Naturalist, or from Strutt's three works—Sylva Britannica, Delicæ Sylvarum, and May Nat. Hist.)

Swilcar Oak, in Needham Forest, is 600 years old (Strutt) The Oak of the Partizans, in the forest of Parey, St. Ouen, is above 650 years old Wallace's Oak, which stood on the spot where the "patriot hero" was born (Hilderthorpe near Paisley) was probably 700 years old when it was blown down in 1859. Salcey Forest Oak, in Northamptonshire, is above 1000 years old. William the Conqueror's Oak, Windsor Great Park, is at least 1200 years old. Winfarthing Oak, Norfolk, and Bentley Oak, were 700 years old at the Conquest, more than 800 years ago. Conthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, is 1600 years old (professor B. met). The great oak of Saintes, in the Charente Inferieur, is reckoned from 1800 to 2000 years old. The Danbury Oak, Dorsetshire, was 2000 years old when it was blown down in 1703. In the Commonwealth, it was inhabited by an old man, and used as an ale-house, its cavity was 16 feet in diameter and 17 feet in height.

In the Water Walk of Magdalen College, Oxford, was an oak supposed to have existed before the Conquest, it was a noble tree when the college was founded in 1418 and was blown down in 1782. On Abbot's Oak, Woburn, the vicar of Puddington, near Chichester, and Roger Hobbs abbot of Woburn were hung, in 1537, by order of Henry VIII, for refusing to surrender their ecclesiastical rights (Marshall). The Bull Oak, Wedgwood Park, and the Plestor Oak, Colborne, were both in existence at the Conquest. The Shellard's Lane Oak, Gloucestershire, is one of the oldest in the island (Journal of a Naturalist, &c.).

The Cadnam Oak, near Lindhurst, in the New Forest, buds "on old Christmas Day," and has done so for at least two centuries, it is covered with foliage at the usual time of other oak trees. The same is said of the tree against which the arrow of Tyrrel glanced when Rufus was killed (Camden).

OLIVE, used in wainscot, because it never gapes, creaks, or cleaves.—B. P.

The eight olive trees on the Mount of Olives were flourishing 800 years ago, when the Turks took Jerusalem.

OSIR, used for punchcocks, wheels for catching eels, bird-cages, baskets, hampers, hurdles, edders, stakes, rake-handles, and poles.

PLANTAIN, used for turnery, joiners' tools, chairs, and picture-frames.

It is worth knowing that pear grafts on a quince stool produce the most abundant and luscious fruit.

PINE TREE. The "Old Guardsman," in Vancouver's Island, is the largest Douglas pine. It is 16 feet in diameter, 51 feet in girth, and 150 feet in height. At one time it was 50 feet higher, but its top was broken off in a storm.

Le pin est employé en charpente en planches en lattes pour la conduite des eaux en bordages pour les ponts des vaisseaux. Il fournit aussi la résine.—Boullée. Dict. de l'art des Sciences.

PLANT TIER. Grass delights to grow in its shade.—B. P.

POPLAR TREE, sacred to Hercules. No wood is so little liable to take fire. The wood is excellent for wood carvings and wainscoting, floors, laths, packing-boxes, and turnery.

Black Poplar. The bark is used by fishermen for buoys, their nets, brooms are made of its twigs. Inlanders, cloths are made of the wood.

The poplar bursts into leaf between March 6 and April 19.

ROSE TREE. The rose is called the "queen of flowers." It is the emblem of England, as the thistle is of Scotland, the shamrock of Ireland, and the lily of France.

It has ever been a favourite on graves as a memorial of affection, hence Propertius says, "It tenera poneret ossa rosa." In Rome, the day when the pope blesses the golden rose is called Domini in Rosa. The long intestine strife between the rival houses of York and Lancaster is called in history the "War of the White and Red Roses," because the badge of the Yorkists was a white rose and that of the Lancastrians a red one. The marriage of Henry VII with Elizabeth of York is called the "Union of the Two Roses."

The rose was anciently considered a token of secrecy, and hence, to whisper a thing sub rosa means it is not to be repeated.

In Persian fable, the rose is the nightingale's bride. "His queen, his garden queen, the rose."

SALLOW, excellent for hurdles, handles of hatchets, and shoemakers' boards. The honey of the catkins is good for bees, and the Highlanders use the bark for tanning leather.

SILVER TREE (The) will reach to the age of 1000 years and more. Spruce is despised by English carpenters, "as a sorry sort of wood."

Il fournit une bûche dite sapinette en anglais et ruce brée qu'on prétend être éminemment utile scierie.—Boullée. Dict. de l'art des Sciences.

SYCAMORE TREE used by turners for bowls and treachers It burst into leaf between March 28 and April 23

St Hierom, who lived in the fourth century A.D., asserts that he himself had seen the sycamore tree into which Zacharias climbed to see Jesus in His passage from Jericho to Jerusalem — Luce xiv 4

Strutt tells us of a sycamore tree in Cobham Park, Kent, 26 feet in girth and 90 feet high Another in Bishopton, Renfrewshire, 20 feet in girth and 60 feet high — Sylva Britannica

Grass will flourish beneath this tree, and the tree will thrive by the sea-side

TAMARISK TREE does not dislike the sea-spray, and therefore thrives in the neighbourhood of the sea

The Romans used to wreath the heads of criminals with tamarisk withes The Tartars and Russians make whip-handles of the wood

The tamarisk is excellent for besoms — B P

ULAS TREE, said to poison everything in its vicinity This is only fit for poetry and romance

WALNUT, best wood for gunstocks, cabinet-makers use it largely

This tree thrives best in valleys, and is most fertile when most beaten — B P

A woman a spaniel and walnut tree
The more you beat them the better they be.
Taylor the water poet (1630).

Unweary'd by funeral woe
Or Walnut whose malignant touch impairs
All generous fruits.

Phillips Cyder I. (1706)

WHITTHORN, used for axle-trees, the handles of tools, and turnery

The identical whitethorn planted by queen Mary of Scotland in the garden-court of the regent Murray, is still alive, and is about 5 feet in girth near the base — Jones, Edinburgh Illustrated

The Froglodytes adorned the graves of their parents with branches of whitethorn It formed the nuptial chaplet of Athenian brides, and the fascis nuptiarum of the Roman maidens

Every shepherd tells his tale
Under this hawthorn in the dale Milton L Allegro (1633).

WILLOW, used for clogs, ladders, trenchers, pill-boxes, milk-pails, butter-firkins, bonnets, cricket bats, hop-poles, cradles, crates, baskets, etc It makes excellent charcoal, and a willow board will sharpen knives and other tools like a hone

Willows to panting shepherds shade dispense
To bees their honey and to corn defence.
Gosse, Fairytale & Georgics, II.

It is said that victims were enclosed in wicker-work made of willow wood, and consumed in fires by the druids, Martial tells us that the old Britons were very skilful in weaving willows into baskets and boats (Epigrams, xiv 99) The shields which so long resisted the Roman legions were willow wood covered with leather

WICH Elm, once in repute for arrows and long-bows Affords excellent wood for the wheeler and millwright The young bark is used for securing thatch and bindings, and is made into rope

The wych elm at Polloe, Renfrewshire, is 88 feet high, 12 feet in girth, and contains 669 feet of timber One at Tutbury is 16 feet in girth — Strutt, Sylva Britannica

At Field, in Staffordshire, is a wych elm 120 feet high and 25 feet in girth about the middle — Plot

YEW TREE The wood is converted into bows, axle-trees, spoons, cups, cogs for mill-wheels, flood-gates for fish-ponds (because the wood does not soon decay), bedsteads (because bugs and fleas will not come near it) Gate-posts of yew are more durable than iron, the steps of ladders should be made of this wood, and no material is equal to it for market-stools Cabinet-makers and inlaiders prize it

In Aberystwith churchyard is a yew tree 24 feet in girth, and another in Selborn churchyard of the same circumference One of the yews at Fountain Abbey, Yorkshire, is 26 feet in girth, one at Aldworth, in Berkshire, is 27 feet in girth, one in Totteridge churchyard 32 feet, and one in Fordingal churchyard, in Perthshire (according to Pennant), is 52 feet in circumference (4 feet from the ground)

The yew tree in East Lavant churchyard is 31 feet in girth, just below the spring of the branches There are five huge branches each as big as a tree, with a girth varying from 6 to 14 feet The tree covers an area of 51 feet in every direction, and above 150 feet in circuit It is above 1000 years old

The yew tree at Martley, Worcester, is 346 years old, being planted three days before the birth of queen Elizabeth That in Harlington churchyard is above 800 years old That at Ankerwyke, near Staines, is said to be the same under which King John signed Magna Charta, and to have been the trusting-tree of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn Three yew trees at Fountain Abbey, we are told were full-grown trees in 1128, when the founders of the abbey held council there in the reign of William Rufus. The yew tree of Braburn, in Kent (according to Dr Candolle), is 3000 years old! It may be so, if it is true that the yew trees of Kingley Bottoni, near Chichester, were standing when the sea-kings landed on the Sussex coast, and those in Norbury Park are the very same which were standing in the time of the ancient druids.

Grass will grow beneath alder, ash, cypress, elm, plane, and sycamore, but not beneath aspen, beech, chestnut, and fir.

Sea-spray does not injure sycamore or tamarisk.

Chestnut and olive never warp, larch is most apt to warp.

For posts the best woods are yew, oak, and larch, one of the worst is chestnut. For picture-frames, maple, pear, oak, and cherry are excellent.

Bees dislike alder, cedar, myrtle, and yew; hares and rabbits never injure lime bark, moths and spiders avoid cedar, worms never attack juniper. Beech and ash are very subject to attacks of insects. Beech is the favourite of dormice, acacia of nightingales.

For binding faggots, the best woods are guelder rose, hazel, osier, willow, and mountain ash.

Knives and all sorts of instruments may be sharpened on ivy roots, willow, and holly wood, as well as on a hone.

Birdlime is made from holly and the guelder rose.

Baskets are made of osier, willow, and other wicker and withy shoots, besoms, of birch, tamarisk, heath, etc.; hurdles, of hazel, barrels and tubs, of chestnut and oak, fishing-rods, of ash, hazel, and blackthorn, gunstocks, of maple and walnut; skewers, of elder and skewer wood, the teeth of rakes, of blackthorn, ash, and the twigs called withy.

The best woods for turnery are box, alder, beech, sycamore, and pear, for Turnbridge ware, lime, for wood carving, box, lime, and poplar, for clogs, willow, alder, and beech, for cars, ash.

Beech is called the cabinet-makers' wood, oak and elm, the ship-builders' wood, ash, the wheelwright's wood.

There are several beautiful lists of trees given by poets. For example, in Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, iii, at the end, where men are sent to cut down trees for the funeral pile of Dudon. In Statius, The Thebaid, vi, where the felling of trees for the pile of the infant Archemorus is described. In Spenser, Fairy Queen, l. 118, 9, where the Red Cross Knight and the lady seek shelter during a storm, and much admire the forest trees—

Trees of the Sun and Moon, orbicular trees growing "at the extremitie of India," mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerin Meschinot.

Tregeagle, the giant of Dismery Pool, on Bodmin Downs (Cornwall). When the wintry winds blare over the downs, it is said to be the giant howling.

Trelawny Ballad (The) is by the Rev R S Hawker of Morwenstow—Notes and Queries, 441 (June, 1876).

Tremor (Sir Lulc), a desperate coward, living in India, who made it a rule never to fight either in his own house, his neighbour's house, or in the street. This half-cowered desperado is everlastingly snubbing his wife. (See Timber, p. 1034.)

Lady Tremor, daughter of a grocer, and grandchild of a wig-maker. Very sensitive on the subject of her plebeian birth, and wanting to be thought a lady of high family.—Mrs Inchbald, Such Things Are (1786).

Tremydd ap Tremhdydd, the man with the keenest sight of all mortals. He could discern "a mote in the sunbeam in any of the four quarters of the world." Clustfein ap Clustfein did was no less celebrated for his acuteness of hearing, "his ear being distressed by the movement of dew in June over a blade of grass." The meaning of these names is, "Sight the son of Seer," and "Ear the son of Hearer"—The Mabinogion ("Notes to Geraint," etc., twelfth century).

Trenmor, great-grandfather of Fingal, and king of Morven (north-west of Scotland). His wife was Imbica, daughter of the king of Lochlin or Denmark—Ossian, Fingal, vi.

In Tenora, ii, he is called the first King of Ireland, and father of Conar.

Trent, says Drayton, is the third in size of the rivers of England, the two larger being the Thames and the Severn. Arden being asked which of her rills she intended to be the chief, the wizard answered, the Trent, for trent means "thirty," and thirty rivers should contribute to its stream, thirty different sorts of fish should live in it, and thirty abbeyes bo built on its banks

my name I take
That thirty doth import thus thirty rivers make—
My greatness thirty abbeyes great
Upon my fruitful banks thims formerly did seat
And thirty kinds of fish within my streams do live
To tie this name of Trent did from that number give.
Dryden Alcyonion xii (1613) and xxv (1622)

Trent (Fred), the senapegrace brother of little Nell "He was a young man of one and twenty, well-made, and certainly handsome, but dissipated, and insolent in air and bearing" The mystery of Fred Trent and little Nell is cleared up in Ch. xix—C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840)

Tres (Scriptores) Richardus Corinensis or Richard of Cirencester (fourteenth century), Gildas Badoniensis, and Nennius Banchorensis, published by professor Bertram (1757)

Tresham (Afr), senior partner of Mr Osbaldistone, senior—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Tresham (Richard), same as general Witherington, who first appears as Matthew Middlemas

Richard Tresham, the son of general Witherington He is also called Richard Middlemas—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Tresham (Thorold lord), head of a noble family, whose boast was that "no blot had ever stained their 'scutcheon," though the family ran back into pre-historic times He was a young, unmarried man, with a sister Mildred, a girl of 14, living with him His near neighbour, Henry earl of Mertoun, asked permission to pay his addresses to Mildred, and Thorold accepted the proposal with much pleasure The old warrener next day told Thorold he had observed for several weeks that a young man climbed into Mildred's chamber at night-time, and he would have spoken before, but did not like to bring his young mistress into trouble Thorold wrung from his sister an acknowledgment of the fact, but she refused to give up the name, yet said she was quite willing to marry the earl This Thorold thought would be dishonourable, and resolved to lie in wait for the unknown visitor On his approach, Thorold discovered it was the earl of Mertoun, and he slew him, then poisoned himself, and Mildred died of a broken heart—Robert Browning, A Blot on the 'Scutcheon

Tressilian (Edmund), the betrothed of Amy Rohsart Amy marries the earl of Leicester, and is killed by falling into a deep pit, to which she had been scandalously inveigled—Sir W Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Trevisan (Sir), a knight to whom Despair gave a hempen rope, that he might go and hang himself—Spenser, Fairy Queen, i (1590)

Tribulation [Wholesome], a pastor of Amsterdam, who thinks "the end will sanctify the means," and uses "the children of perdition" to promote his own object, which he calls the "work of God" He is one of the dupes of Subtle "the alchemist" and his factotum Ince—Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610)

Tribune of the People (The), John Bright (1811—)

Tricolour, the national badge of France since 1789 It consists of the Bourbon white cockade, and the blue and red cockade of the city of Paris combined It was Lafayette who devised this symbolical union of king and people, and when he presented it to the nation, "Gentlemen," said he, "I bring you a cockade that shall make the tour of the world" (See STORIELLO VERSES, p 948)

If you will wear a livery let it at least be that of the city of Paris—blue and red, my friends.—Dumas, Six Years Afterwards xv (1846)

Tricoteuses de Robespierre (Les), femmes qui assistaient en tricotant aux scènes de la Convention, des clubs populaires, et du tribunal révolutionnaire Encouragées par la commune, elles se portèrent à de tels excès qu'on les surnomma les Furies de la guillotine Elles disparurent avec la société des Jacobins—Bomillet, Diet Universel

Triermaln (The Bridal of), a poem by sir Walter Scott, in four cantos, with introduction and conclusion (1813) In the introduction, Arthur is represented as the person who tells the tale to Lucy, his bride Gyneth, a natural daughter of king Arthur and Guendolen, was promised in marriage to the bravest knight in a tournament, but she suffered so many combats to fall without dropping the warder, that Merlin threw her into an enchanted sleep, from which she was not to wake till a knight as brave as those who had fallen claimed her in marriage After the lapse of 500 years, sir Roland de Vanx, baron of Triermaln, undertook to break the spell, but had first to overcome four temptations, viz., fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition. Having come off more than conqueror, Gyneth awoke, and became his bride.

Trifaldi (The countess), called "The Afflicted Duenna" of the princess Antonomaria (heirress to the throne of Candava). She was called Trifaldi from her robe, which was divided into three triangles, each of which was supported by a page. The face of this duenna was, by the enchantment of the giant Malambroino, covered with a large, rough beard, but when don Quixote mounted Clavileno the Winged, "the enchantment was dissolved."

Trifle (Miss Penelope), an old maiden sister of sir Penurious Trifle. Stiff as a ramrod, prim as fine airs and graces could make her, fond of long words, and delighting in phrases modelled in true Johnsonian ponderosity.

Trifle (Miss Sally), daughter of sir Penurious, tricked into marriage with Mr Hartop, a young spendthrift, who fell in love with her fortune.

* * Sir Penurious Trifle is not introduced, but Hartop assumes his character, and makes him fond of telling stale and pointless stories. He addresses sir Gregory as "you knight"—Toote, The Knights (1753)

Trim (Corporal), uncle Toby's oraciously faithful, simple-minded, and most affectionate. Valuable in speech, but most respectful. Half companion, but never forgetting he is his master's servant. Trim is the duplicate of uncle Toby in self. The latter at all times shows himself the officer and the gentleman, born to command and used to obedience, while the former always carries traces of the drill-yard, and shows that he has been accustomed to receive orders with deference, and to execute them with military precision. It is a great compliment to say that the corporal was worthy such a noble master—Sterne, The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759)

Trim instead of being the opposite is the duplicate of uncle Toby yet is the character of the common soldier nicely discriminated from that of the officer. His whole carriage bears traces of the art of war, which are wanting in the superior. Under the name of a servant, he is in reality a companion and a delighted mixture of familiarity and respect. It is enough to say that Trim was worthy to walk behind his master—Elwin, ed. of the Quarterly Review (1833-60)

Trimalchi, a celebrated cook in the reign of Nero, mentioned by Petronius. He had the art of giving to the most common fish the flavour and appearance of the most highly esteemed. Like Ude, he said that "sauces are the soul of cookery, and coolery the soul of festivity," or, as the cat-gut man observed, "tis the seasonin' as does it."

Trinaeria. Sicily is so called from its three promontories (Greek, trin akra) (1) Pelo'ria (Capo di Iaro), in the north, called Faro from the pharos, (2) Pachylinus (Capo d' Passaro), in the south, (3) Talybarum (Capo di Marsella or Capo di Boco), in the west.

Trin'ket (Lord), a man of fashion and a libertine.

He is just polite enough to be able to be very un-mannerly with a great deal of good breeding. It is just handsome enough to make him excessive value of his person and has just reflection enough to find him for a coxcomb qualifications very common among men of quality.—G. Colman The Jealous Wife II 3 (1761)

Trip to Scarborough (A), * comedy by Sheridan (1777), based on The Relapse, by Vanbrugh (1697) Lord Foppington goes to Scarborough to marry Miss Hoyden, daughter of sir Tunbely Clumsy, but his lordship is not known personally to the knight and his daughter Tom Fashion, younger brother of lord Foppington, having been meanly treated by his elder brother, resolves to outwit him, so, passing himself off as lord Foppington, he gets introduced to sir Tunbely, and marries Miss Hoyden before the rightful claimant appears. When at length lord Foppington arrives, he is treated as an impostor, till Tom Fashion explains the ruse. As his lordship behaves contumeliously to the knight, matters are easily arranged, lord Foppington retires, and sir Tunbely accepts Tom Fashion as his son-in-law with good grace.

Tripe (1 syl), the nickname of Mrs Hamilton, of Covent Garden Theatre (1780-1788)

Mrs Hamilton being hissed came forward and said "Gentlemen and ladies, I suppose as how you hiss me because I did not play at Mrs. Bellamy's benefit. I would have done so, but she said as how my audience were all tripe people." When the fair speaker got thus far the pit roared out. Well said Tripe! a title she retained till she quitted the theatre.—Memoir of Mrs Hamilton (1803)

Triple Alliance (The)

1 A treaty between Great Britain, Sweden, and the United Provinces, in 1668, for the purpose of checking the ambition of Louis XIV

2 A treaty between George I of England, Philip duke of Orleans regent of France, and the United Provinces, for the purpose of counteracting the plans of Alberoni the Spanish minister, 1717

Mrs Trippet, the beau's wife, who "would dance for four and twenty hours together," and play cards for twice that length of time — Garriek, The Lying Valet (1740)

Tripping as an Omen

When Julius Cæsar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he happened to trip and fall on his face. This would have been considered a fatal omen by his army, but, with admirable presence of mind, he exclaimed, "Thus take I possession of thee, O Africa!"

A similar story is told of Scipio. Upon his arrival in Africa, he also happened to trip, and, observing that his soldiers looked upon this as a bad omen, he clutched the earth with his two hands, and cried aloud, "Now, Africa, I hold thee in my grasp!"—Don Quixote, II iv 6

When William the Conqueror leaped on shore at Baulverhythe, he fell on his face, and a great cry went forth that the omen was unlucky, but the duke exclaimed, "I take seisin of this land with both my hands!"

The same story is told of Napoleon in Egypt, of king Olaf, son of Harald, in Norway, of Junius Brutus, who, returning from the oracle, fell on the earth, and cried, "'Tis thus I kiss thee, mother Earth!"

When captain Jean Cœurpreux tripped in dancing at the Tuileries, Napoleon III held out his hand to help him up, and said, "Captain, this is the second time I have seen you fall. The first was by my side in the field of Magenta." Then turning to the lady he added, "Madam, captain Cœurpreux is henceforth commandant of my Guides, and will never fall in duty or allegiance, I am persuaded."

Trismegistus ("thrice greatest"), Hermès the Egyptian philosopher, or Thoth councillor of Osiris. He invented the art of writing in hieroglyphics, harmony, astrology, magic, the lute and lyre, and many other things.

Tris'sotin, a bel esprit. Philaminte (3 syl), a femme savante, wishes him to marry her daughter Henriette, but Henriette is in love with Clitandre. The difficulty is soon solved by the announcement that Henriette's father is on the verge of bankruptcy, whereupon Trissotin makes his bow and retires — Molière, Les Femmes Savantes (1672)

Trissotin is meant for the abbe Crotin, who affected to be poet, gallant, and preacher. His dramatic name was "Tricotin."

Tristramp (Sir), son of sir Meliodas king of Li'onès and Elizabeth his wife (daughter of sir Mark king of Cornwall). He was called Tristramp ("sorrowful"), because his mother died in giving him birth. His father also died when Tristramp was a mere lad (pt ii 1). He was knighted by his uncle Mark (pt ii 5), and married Isond le Blanch Mams, daughter of Howell king of Britain (Britany), but he never loved her, nor would he live with her. His whole love was centred on his aunt, La Belle Isond, wife of king Mark, and this unhappy attachment was the cause of numberless troubles, and ultimately of his death. La Belle Isoud, however, was quite as culpable as the knight, for she herself told him, "My measure of hate for Mark is as the measure of my love for thee," and when she found that her husband would not allow sir Tristram to remain at Intagel Castle she eloped with him, and lived three years at Joyous Guard, near Carlisle. At length she returned home, and sir Tristram followed her. His death is variously related. Thus the History of Prince Arthur says

When by means of a treaty, Ir Tristram brought again La Belle Isoud unto him, Mark from Joyous Guard the fel a traitor him, Mark slew the noble knight as he sat lazing before his lady, La Belle Isoud, with a sharp grey and white which he thrust into him from behind his back.—PL III. 147 (14 0)

Tennyson gives the tale thus. He says that sir Tristram, dallying with his aunt, hung a ruby carcanet round her throat, and, as he kissed her neck

Out of the dark just as the lips had touched,
Behind him rose a shadow and a shriek—
"Mark's war!"—saw Mark and drove him thro the brain
Tennyson Idylls of the Last Tournament

Another tale is this. Sir Tristram was severely wounded in Brittany, and sent a dying request to his aunt to come and see him. If she consented, a white flag was to be hoisted on the mast-head of her ship, if not, a black one. His wife told him the ship was in sight, displaying a black flag, at which words the strong man bowed his head and died. When his aunt came ashore and heard of his death, she flung herself on the body, and died also. The two were buried in one grave, and Mark planted over it a rose and a vine, which became so interwoven it was not possible to separate them.

* * Sir Launcelot, sir Tristram, and sir Lamorak were the three bravest and best of the 150 knights of the Round Table, but were all equally guilty in their amours. Sir Launcelot with the queen, sir Tristram with his aunt, king Mark's wife, and sir Lamorak with his aunt, king Lot's wife.

Tristram's Book (Sir) Any book of venery, hunting, or hawking is so called.

Tristram began good measures of blowing good blasts of venery and of chase and of all manner of vermin. All these terms have we still of hawking and hunting, and therefore a book of venery is called The Book of Sir Tristram.—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur II. 3 (1470)

Sir Tristram's Hoose, Passetreuil or

Passé Brewell. It is called both, but one seems to be a clerical error.

(Passé Brewell is in Sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur, II. 68.)

History of Sir Tristram or Tristan The oldest story is by Gotfrid of Strassbourg, a minnesinger (twelfth century), entitled Tristan and Isolde. It was continued by Ulrich of Turheim, by Heinrich of Freyburg, and others, to the extent of many thousand verses. The tale of sir Tristram, derived from Welsh traditions, was versified by Thomas the Rhymor of Irceldoune.

The second part of the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory, is almost exclusively confined to the adventures of sir Tristram, as the third part is to the adventures of sir Launcelot and the quest of the holy grail (1170).

Matthew Arnold has a poem entitled Tristram, and R. Wagner, in 1865, produced his opera of Tristan and Isolde.

See Michel, Tristan, Recueil de ce qui reste des Poemes relatifs a ses Aventures (1835).

Tristrem l'Hermite, provost-marshal of France in the reign of Louis XI. Introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward (1823) and in Anne of Geurstein (1829).

Trithem (J), chronicler and theologian of Treves, elected abbot of Spanheim at the age of 22 years. He tried to reform the monks, but produced a revolt, and resigned his office. He was then appointed abbot of Würzburg (1162-1516).

Gav has a poem in three books, called Trivia or the Art of Walking the Streets of London The first book describes the "implements for walking and the signs of the weather" The second book describes the difficulties, etc., of "walking by day," and the third, the dangers of "walking by night" (1712)

* * "Trivium" has quite another meaning, being an old theological term for the three elementary subjects of education, viz, grammar, rhetoric, and logic The "quadrivium" embraced music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy, and the two together were called the seven arts or sciences

Troglodytes (8 or 4 syl) According to Pliny (Nat Hist, v 8), the Troglodytes lived in caves under ground, and fed on serpents In modern parlance we call those who live so secluded as not to be informed of the current events of the day, troglydites Longfellow calls ants by the same name

(Thou the) nomadic tribes of ants

Troilus (3 syl), a son of Priam king of Troy In the picture described by Virgil (Æneid, 1 474-478), he is represented as having thrown down his arms and fleeing in his chariot "impar congressus Achilli," he is pierced with a lance, and, having fallen backwards, still holding the reins, the lance with which he is transfixed "scratches the sand over which it trails"

Chaucer in his Troilus and Criseide, and Shakespeare in his drama of Troilus and Cressida, follow Lollius, an old Lombard romancer, historiographer of Urbino, in Italy Lollius's tale, wholly unknown in classic fiction, is that Troilus falls in love with Cressid daughter of the priest Chalcas, and Pandarus is employed as a go-between After Troilus has obtained a promise of marriage from the priest's daughter, an exchange of prisoners is arranged, and Cressid, falling to the lot of Diomed, prefers her new master to her Trojan lover

Chaucer's Troilus and Criseide is not one of the Canterbury Tales, but quite an independent one in five books It contains 8246 lines, nearly 3000 of which are borrowed from the Filosofo of Boccaccio

Trois Chapitres (Les) or THE THREE CHAPTERS, three theological works on the "Incarnation of Christ and His dual nature" The authors of the "chapters" are Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa The work was condemned in 553 as heretical

Trois Echelles, executioner—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Trovato're (4 syl) or "The Troubadour" is Mann'co, the supposed son of Azuce'na the gipsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna). The princess Leonora falls in love with the troubadour, but the count, entertaining a base passion for her, is about to put Mannico to death, when Leonora intercedes on his behalf, and promises to give herself to him if he will spare her lover. The count consents, but while he goes to release his captive, Leonora kills herself by sucking poison from a ring. When Mannico discovers this sad calamity, he dies also — Verdi, Il Trovatore (1853)

(This opera is based on the drama of Gargia Gutierrez, a fifteenth century story)

Troxartas (3 syl), king of the mice and father of Psygnarax who was drowned. The word means "bread-eater"

Trunnon (Commodore Hawser), a one-eyed naval veteran, who has retired from the service in consequence of injuries received in engagements, but he still keeps garrison in his own house, which is defended with drawbridge and ditch. He sleeps in a hammock, and makes his servants sleep in hammocks, as on board ship, takes his turn on watch, and indulges his naval tastes in various other ways. Lieutenant Jack Hatchway is his companion. When he went to be married, he rode on a hunter which he steered like a ship, according to the compass, tacking about, that he might not "go right in the wind's eye" — I Smollett, The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1750)

Shakespeare, Hamlet act IV sc. 7

Tuck (Friar), the "curtal friar of Fountain's Abbey," was the father confessor of Robin Hood. He is represented as a sleek-headed, pudgy, paunchy, pugnacious clerical Falstaff, very fat and self-indulgent, very humorous, and somewhat coarse. His dress was a russet habit of the Franciscan order, a red corded girdle with gold tassel, red stockings, and a wallet

Sir Walter Scott, in his Ivanhoe, calls him the holy clerk of Copmanhurst, and describes him as a "large, strong-built man in a sackcloth gown and hood, girt with a rope of rushes." He had a round, bullet head, and his close-shaven crown was edged with thick, stiff, curly black hair. His countenance was bluff and jovial, eyebrows black and bushy, forehead well-turned, cheeks round and ruddy, beard long, curly, and black, form brawny (ch 11)

In the May-day morris-dance, the friar is introduced in full clerical tonsure, with the chaplet of white and red beads in his right hand, a corded girdle about his waist, and a russet robe of the Franciscan order. His stockings red, his girdle red ornamented with gold twist and a golden tassel. At his girdle hung a wallet for the reception of provisions, for "Walleteers" had no other food but what they received from begging. Friar Tuck was chaplain to Robin Hood the May-king (See MORRIS-DANCE)

Turbulent School of Fiction
(The), a school of German romance writers, who returned to the feudal ages, and wrote between 1780 and 1800 in the style of Mrs Radcliffe. The best known are Cramer, Spiers, Schlenker, and Veit Weber.

Turcaret, a comedy by Lesage
(1708), in which the farmers-general of France are gibbeted unmercifully. He is a coarse, illiterate man, who has grown rich by his trade. Any one who has risen from nothing to great wealth, and has no merit beyond money-making,
is called a Turcaret.

Turcos, native Algerian infantry officered by Frenchmen. The cavalry are called Spahis.

Turk Gregory, Gregory VII (Hildebrand), so called for his furious raid upon royal prerogatives, especially his contest with the emperor [of Germany] on the subject of investiture. In 1075 he summoned the emperor Henry IV to Rome, the emperor refused to obey the summons, the pope excommunicated him, and absolved all his subjects from their allegiance, he next declared Henry dethroned, and elected a new kaiser, but Henry, finding resistance in vain, begged to be reconciled to the pope. He was now commanded, in the midst of a severe winter, to present himself, with Bertha his wife, and their infant son, at the castle of Canossa, in Lombardy, and here they had to stand three days in the piercing cold before the pope would con-descend to see him, but at last the proud prelate removed the excommunication, and Henry was restored to his throne.

Turkish Spy (The), Mahmut, who lived forty-five years undiscovered in Paris, unfolding the intrigues of the Christian courts, between 1637 and 1682.
The author of this romance is Giovanni Paolo Marana, and he makes it the medium of an historical novel of the period (1684).

Ned Ward wrote an imitation called
The London Spy (1698–1700).

Turpin, a churlish knight, who refuses hospitality to sir Calpine and Serena, although solicited to do so by his wife Blanka (bk vii 3). Serena told prince Arthur of this discourtesy, and the prince, after chastising Turpin, dis-knighted him, and prohibited him from bearing arms ever after (bk vii 7). The disgraced churl now vowed revenge, so off he starts, and seeing two knights, complains to them of the wrongs done to himself and his dame by "a recreant knight," whom he points out to them. The two champions instantly challenge the prince "as a foul woman-wronger," and defy him to combat. One of the two champions is soon slain, and the other overthrown, but is spared on craving his life. The survivor now returns to Turpin to relate his misadventure, and when they reach the dead body see Arthur asleep. Turpin proposes to kill him, but Arthur starts up and hangs the rascal on a tree (bk vii 7)—Spenser, Fairy Queen (1596)

Turpin, "archbishop of Rheims," the hypothetical author of a Chronicle, purporting to be a history of Charlemagne's Spanish adventures in 777, by a contemporary. This fiction was declared authentic and genuine by pope Calixtus II in 1122, but it is now generally attributed to a canon of Barcelona in the eleventh century.

The tale says that Charlemagne went to Spain in 777, to defend one of his allies from the aggressions of a neighbouring prince. Having conquered Navarre and Aragon, he returned to France. He then crossed the Pyrenees, and invested Pampeluna for three months, but without success. He tried the effect of prayer, and the walls, like those of Jericho, fell down of their own accord. Those Saracens who consented to be baptized, he spared, but the rest were put to the sword. Being master of Pampeluna, the hero visited the sarcophagus of James, and Turpin, who accompanied him, baptized most of the neighbourhood. Charlemagne then led back his army over the Pyrenees, the rear being under the command of Roland. The main army reached France in safety, but 50,000 Saracens fell on the rear, and none escaped.

Turpin (Dick), a noted highway man, executed at York (1739)

Ainsworth has introduced into Rookwood Turpin's famous ride to York on his steed Black Bess. It is said that Maginn really wrote this powerful description (1834)

Turpin (The French Dick) is Cartouche, an eighteenth century highway man. W H Ainsworth made him the hero of a romance (1811)

Turquine (Sir) had sixty-four of king Arthur's knights in prison, all of whom he had vanquished by his own hand. He hated sir Launcelot, because he had slain his brother, sir Carados, at the Dolorous Tower. Sir Launcelot challenged sir Turquine to a trial of strength, and slew him, after which he liberated the captive knights—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 108-110 (1470)

Turquoise (2 syl), a precious stone found in Persia. Sundry virtues are attached to it. (1) It indicates by its hue the state of the wearer's health; (2) it indicates by its change of lustre if any peril awaits the wearer; (3) it removes animosity between the giver and the receiver; (4) it rouses the sexual passion, and hence Leah gave a turquoise ring to Shiloh "when he was a bachelor," in order to make him propose to her—See Thomas Nicols, Lapidary

Tut'veydrop (Mt), a selfish, self-indulgent, conceited dancing-master, who imposes on the world by his majestic appearance and elaborate toilette. He lives on the earnings of his son (named Prince, after the prince regent), who reveres him as a perfect model of "deportment"—C Dickens, Bleat House (1852)

The proudest departed from the cover of their habitual reserve and from the maintenance of that staid deportment which the Oriental Tut'veydrop considers the best proof of high state and regal dignity—W. H. Russell The Prince of Tours etc (1877)

The Tu can poet doth advance
The frantic paladin of France
M. Drayton Nymphidia (1563-1631)

Tutivillus, the demon who collects all the fragments of words omitted, mutilated, or mispronounced by priests in the performance of religious services, and stores them up in that "bottomless" pit which is "paved with good intentions"—Langland, Vision of Piers Plowman, 547 (1362), and the Townley Mysteries, 310, 319, etc

Tutsan, a corruption of la toute same, the botanical name is Hypericon Androsaemum. The leaves applied to fresh wounds are sanative. St John's wort is of the same family, and that called Perforatum used to be called Fuga dæmonum, from the supposition of its use in maniacal disorders, and a charm against evil spirits

Twweed, a cloth woven diagonally, a mere blunder for "twill"

It was the word twweels blotted and ill written on an invoice which gave rise to the now familiar name of twweed. Twelfth Night, a drama by Shakespeare. The story came originally from a novella by Boccaccio (who died 1355), reproduced by Belleforest in his Historiques Tragiques, from which Shakespeare obtained his story. The tale is this: Viola and Sebastian were twins, and exactly alike. When grown up, they were shipwrecked off the coast of Illyria, and both were saved. Viola, being separated from her brother, in order to obtain a livelihood, dressed like her brother and took the situation of page under the duke Orsino. The duke, at the time, happened to be in love with Olivia, and as the lady looked coldly on his suit, he sent Viola to advance it, but the wilful Olivia, instead of melting towards the duke, fell in love with his beautiful page. One day, Sebastian, the twin-brother of Viola, being attacked in a street brawl before Olivia's house, the lady, thinking him to be the page, invited him in, and they soon grew to such familiar terms that they agreed to become man and wife. About the same time, the duke discovered his page to be a beautiful woman, and, as he could not marry his first love, he made Viola his wife and the duchess of Illyria

* * There is considerable resemblance between the twelve selected paladins and the twelve selected Table knights. In each case there were three pre-eminent for bravery: Oliver, Roland, and Rinaldo (paladins), Launcelot, Tristram, and Lancelot (Table knights). In each was a Saracen: Ferumbras (the paladin), Palomides (the Table knight). In each was a traitor: Ganelon (the paladin), Mordred (the Table knight), like Judas Iscariot in the apostolic twelve.

Who bear the bows were knights in Arthur's reign,
Twelve they and twelve the peers of Charlemaign.
Dryden The Flower and the Leaf

Twelve Wise Masters (The), the original corporation of the mastersingers: Hans Sachs, the cobbler of Nürnberg, was the most renowned and the most voluminous of the mastersingers, but he was not one of the original twelve. He lived 1494-1576, and left behind him thirty-four folio vols. of MS., containing 208 plays, 1700 comic tales, and about 450 lyric poems.

Here Hans Sachs, the cobbler poet laureate of the gentle craft, Wiseest of the Twelve Wise Masters, in huge folios sang and laughed.

Longfellow Nuremberg

* * The original corporation consisted of Heinrich von Mueglen, Konrad Harder, Master Altschwert, Master Barthel Regenbogen (blacksmith), Master Muscablüt (tailor), Hans Blotz (barber), Hans Rosenblüt (armorial painter), Sebastian Brandt (jurist), Thomas Murner, Hans Folz (surgeon), Wilhelm Weber, and Hans Sachs (cobbler). This last, though not one of the founders, was so superior to them all that he is always reckoned among the wise mastersingers.

Twemlow (Mr), first cousin to Lord Snagsworth, "an innocent piece of dinner-furniture," in frequent requisition by Mr- and Mrs Veneering. He is described as "grey, dry, polite, and susceptible to east wind," he wears "first-gentleman-in-Europe collar and cravat," "his cheeks are drawn in as if he had made a great effort to retire into himself some years ago, and had got so far, but never any further." His great mystery is who is Mr Veneering's oldest friend, is he himself his oldest or his newest acquaintance? He couldn't tell.—C. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864).

Twickenham (The Bard of), Alexander Pope, who lived for thirty years at Twickenham (1688-1744).

Twigtythe (The Rev Mr), clergyman at Fasthwaite Farm, held by Farmer Williams.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.).

Twin Brethren (The Great), Castor and Pollux.

Back comes the chief in triumph
Who in the hour of fight,
Hath seen the Great Twin Brethren
In harness on his right.
Safe comes the ship to haven
Thro' billows and thro' gales
If once the Great Twin Brethren
Sit shining on the sails.

Lord Macaulay Lays of Ancient Rome (Battle of the Lake Regillus, xl. 1842)

Twin Diamonds (The), two Cape diamonds, one of which is of a clear cinnamon colour, and was found in the river-bed of the Vaal. These, with the Dudley and Stewart diamonds, have all been discovered in Africa since 1870.

Twineall (The Hon Mr), a young man who goes to India, intending to work himself into place by flattery, but, wholly mistaking character, he gets thrown into prison for treason. Twineall talks to Sir Luke Tremor (who ran away from the field of battle) of his glorious deeds of fight, to Lady Tremor (a grocer's daughter) of high birth, supposing her to be a descendant of the kings of Scotland, to Lord Flint (the sultan's chief minister) of the sultan's dubious right to the throne, and so on.—Mrs Inchbald, Such Things Are (1786).

Twist (Oliver), the son of Mr Brownlow's oldest friend and Agnes Fleming, half-brother to "Manks." He was born and brought up in a workhouse, starved, and ill-treated, but was always gentle, amiable, and pure-minded. His asking for more gruel at the workhouse because he was so hungry, and the astonishment of the officials at such daring impudence, is capitally told.—Charles Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837).

Twitcher (Harry). Henry lord Brougham [Broom] was so called, from his habit of twitching his neck (1778-1868).

Don't you recollect North some years ago that Murray's name was on our title-page, and that, being alarmed for Subscription Jamie (Sir James Mackintosh) and Harry Twitcher he scratched his name out?—Wilson Acetes Ambrosiana (1823-36).

Twitcher (Jemmy), a cunning and treacherous highwayman in Macbeth's gang.—Gray, The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Twitcher (Jemmy), the nickname of John lord Sandwich, noted for his liaison with Miss Ray (1718-1792).

Gray (1716-1771)

Two Drovers (The), a tale in two chapters, laid in the reign of George III, written by sir Walter Scott (1827). It is one of the "Chronicles of the Canongate" (see p. 186), supposed to be told by Mr Croftlangry, Robin Oig McCombich, a Highland drover, revengeful and proud, meets with Harry Wakeheld, a jovial English drover, and quarrels with him about a pasture-field. They fight in Heskett's ale-house, but are separated. Oig goes on his way and gets a dagger, with which he returns to the ale-house, and stabs Harry who is three parts drunk. Being tried for murder, he is condemned and executed.

Two Eyes of Greece (The), Athens and Sparta

Athen, the eye of Greece mother of art
And eloquence.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, a drama by Shal espeare, the story of which is taken from the Diana of Montemayor (sixteenth century). The tale is this: Protheus and Valentine were two friends, and Protheus was in love with a lady of Verona, named Julia. Valentine went to sojourn in Milan, and there fell in love with Silvia, the duke's daughter, who was promised in marriage to Thurio. Protheus, being sent by his father to Milan, forgot Julia, fell in love with Silvia, and, in order to carry his point, induced the duke to banish Valentine, who became the captain of a banditti, into whose hands Silvia fell. Julia, unable to bear the absence of her lover, dressed in boy's clothes, and, going to Milan, hired herself as a page to Protheus, and when Silvia was lost, the duke, with Thurio, Protheus and his page, went in quest of her. She was soon discovered, but when Thurio attempted to take possession of her, Valentine said to him, "I dare you to touch her," and Thurio replied, "None but a fool would fight for a girl." The duke, disgusted, gave Silvia to Valentine, and Protheus, ashamed of his conduct, begged pardon of Valentine, discovered his page to be Julia, and married her (1695).

Two Kings of Brentford (The)
In the duke of Buckingham's farce called The Rehearsal (1671), the two lings enter hand-in-hand, dance together, sing together, walk arm-in-arm, and, to heighten the absurdity, they are made to smell of the same nosegay (act ii 2).

Two-Legged Mare (The), a galloos Vice says to Tyburn

I will help to bridle the two-legged mare.
Like Will to Life etc (1587)

Two-Shoes (Goody), a nursery tale by Oliver Goldsmith (1765). Goody Two-shoes was a very poor child, whose delight at having a pair of shoes was so unbounded that she could not forbear telling every one she met that she had "two shoes," whence her name. She acquired knowledge and became wealthy. The title-page states that the tale is for the benefit of those,

Who from a state of rags and care
And having shoes but half a pair
Their fortune and their fame should fix
And go top in a coach and six.

Two Strings to Your Bow, a farce by Jephson (1792). Lazarillo, wanting a master, enters the service of don Felix and also of Octavio at the same time. He makes perpetual blunders, such as giving letters and money to the wrong master, but it turns out that don Felix is donna Clara, the betrothed of Octavio. The lovers meet at the Eagle hotel, recognize each other, and become man and wife.

Two Unlucky. In our dynasties two has been an unlucky number, thus Ethelred II was forced to abdicate, Harold II was slain at Hastings, William II was shot in the New Forest, Henry II had to fight for his crown, which was usurped by Stephen, Edward II was murdered at Berkeley Castle, Richard II was deposed, Charles II was driven into exile, James II was obliged to abdicate, George II was worsted at Fontenoy and Lawfield, was disgraced by general Braddock and admiral Byng, and was troubled by Charles Edward the Young Pretender.

Two or Three Berries. "Yet gleaming grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough"—Isaiah xlviii 6

The tree of life has been shaken,
And but few of us linger now
Like the prophet's two or three berries
On the top of the uppermost bough

Longfellow The Meeting

Tyb'alt, a fiery young nobleman of Verona, nephew to lady Capulet, and cousin to Juliet. He is slain in combat by Ro'meo—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1595)

The name is given to the cat in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox. Hence Mercutio calls him "rat-catcher" (act iii se 1), and when Tybalt demands of him, "What wouldst thou have with me?" Mercutio replies, "Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives" (act iii se 1)

Tybalt, a Lombard officer, in love with Laura niece of duke Gondibert. The story of Gondibert being unfinished, no sequel of this attachment is given—Sir W. Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Tybalt or Tibert, the cat, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498)

'Tyburn Tree (The), a gallows so called because criminals were at one time hung on the elm trees which grew on the banks of the Tyburn. The "Holy Maid of Kent," Mrs. Turner the poisoner, Felton the assassin of the duke of Buckingham, Jack Sheppard, Jonathan Wild, lord Ferrers who murdered his steward, Dr. Dodd, and Mother Brownrigg, "all died in their shoes" on the Tyburn tree

'Tyburnia, the district round about the Marble Arch, London. So called from the littlebourne or stream named Tyburn. At one time, elm trees grew on the brook-side, and Roger de Mortimer the paramour of queen Eleanor, was hung thereon

Tycho, a vassal of the bishop of Traves, in the reign of Kaiser Henry IV. He promised to avenge his lord and master, who had been plundered by count Adalbert, the leader of a bandit. So, going to the count's castle, he craved a draught of water. The porter brought him a cup of wine, and Tycho said, "Thank thy lord for his charity, and tell him he shall meet with his reward." Then, returning home, he procured thirty large wine-barrels, in each of which he concealed an armed retainer and weapons for two others. Each cart was then carried by two men to the count's castle, and when the door was opened, Tycho said to the porter, "I am come to recompense thy lord and master," and the sixty men carried in the thirty barrels. When coun-

Adalbert went to look at the present, at a signal given by Tycho the tops of the casks flew off, and the ninety armed men slew the count and his brigands, and then burnt the castle to the ground

Of course, every reader will instantly see the resemblance of this tale to that of "Ali Baba or the Forty Thieves" (Arabian Nights' Entertainments)

Tyler (Wat), a frugal, honest, industrious, skilful blacksmith of Essex, with one daughter, Alice, pretty, joyous, innocent, and modest. With all his frugality and industry, Wat found it very hard to earn enough for daily bread, and the tax-collectors came for the poll-tax, three groats a head for a war to maintain our conquests in France. Wat had saved up the money, and proffered six groats for himself and wife. The collectors demanded three groats for Alice also, but Tyler said she was under 15 years of age, whereupon, one of the collectors having "insulted her virgin modesty," Tyler felled him to the ground with his sledge-hammer. The people gathered round the smith, and a general uprising ensued. Richard II sent a herald to Tyler to request a parley, and pledging his royal word for his safe conduct. The sturdy smith appointed Smithfield for the rendezvous, and there Tyler told the king the people's grievances, but while he was speaking, William Walworth, the lord mayor, stabbed him from behind, and killed him. The king, to pacify the people, promised the poll-tax should be taken off and their grievances redressed, but no sooner had the mob dispersed than the rebels were cut down wholesale, and many, being subjected to a mock trial, were infamously executed—Southey, Wat Tyler (1791), published 1817)

Tyll Owlyglass or TYLL OWLYGLASS, by Thomas Murner, a Swiss monk of Strasbourg (1475-1516), the English name of the German "Tyll Tulenspiegel." Tyll is a mechanic of Brunswick, who runs from pillar to post as charlatan, physician, jansquenet, fool, valet, artist, and jack-of-all-trades. He undertakes anything and everything, but invariably "spoils the Egyptians" who trust in him. He produces popular proverbs, is brimful of merry mischief, droll as Sam Slick, indifferent honest as Gil Blas, light-hearted as Andru Houde, as full of tricks as Scapin, and as popular as Robin Hood. The book is crammed with observations, anecdotes, fables, bon mots, facetiae, and shows forth the omnipotence of common sense. There are two good English versions of this popular picaresque romance—one printed by William Copland, and entitled The Merrye Jests of a Man called Hockeglass, and the many Marvellous Tumpes and Jests which he did in his life in Fastland, and the other published in 1860, translated by K R H Mackenzie, and illustrated by Alfred Crowquill. In 1720 was brought out a modified and abridged edition of the German story.

To few mortals has it been granted to earn such a place in national history as Tyll Luken's legend (Ulenspiegel). Now after five centuries, Tyll's native village is pointed out with pride to the traveller and his tombstone still stands at Mollen near Lubek where since 1334 (sic) his once nimble bones have been at rest.—Carlyle.

Tylwyth Teg, or the "Family of Beauty," elves who "dance in the moonlight on the velvet sward," in their airy and flowing robes of blue and green, white and scarlet. These beautiful fays delight in showering benefits on the human race.—The Mabinogion (note, p. 263).

Tyrrel (Francis), the nephew of Mr Mortimer. He loves Miss Aubrey "with an ardent, firm, disinterested love." On one occasion, Miss Aubrey was insulted by Lord Courtland, with whom Tyrrel fought a duel, and was for a time in hiding, but when Courtland recovered from his wounds, Tyrrel re-appeared, and ultimately married the lady of his affection—Cumberland, The Fashionable Lover (1780).

Tyrrel (Frank) or Martigny earl of Etherington, son of the late earl and la comtesse de Martigny his wife. He is supposed to be illegitimate. Frank is in love with Clara Mowbray, daughter of Mr Mowbray of St Ronan's—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III).

Tyrtæos, selected by the Spartans as their leader, because his lays inspired the soldiers to deeds of daring. The following is a translation of one of his martial songs—

Oh how soon will I see the foe

From home as an exile to fly

Unrecompensed labour starvation and scorn,

The feet of the captives attend

He honoured his race by rude foes overcome

From altar from country from kith and kin torn;

No brother no sister no friend.

Ubaldo and Ricardo, two men sent by Honoria queen of Hungary, to tempt the fidelity of Sophia, because the queen was in love with her husband Mathias. Immediately Sophia understood the object of their visit, she had the two men confined in separate rooms, where they were made to earn their food by spinning—Massinger, The Picture (1629).

Ube'da (Orbancia of), a painter who drew a cock so preposterously that he was obliged to write under it, "This is a cock," in order that the spectator might know what was intended to be represented—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II : 3 (1615).

Uberti (Farnata Degli), a noble Florentine, leader of the Ghibelline faction. Dante represents him in his Inferno as lying in a fiery tomb yet open and not to be closed till the last judgment.

Uberto, count d'Este, etc.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Udaller, one who holds land by allodial tenure. Magnus Troll was a udaller, in sir W. Scott's Pirate.

Ude, the most learned of cooks, author of La Science du Gucule. He says, "Coquins nascitur not fit." That "music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanics possess professors under 20 years of age, but pre-eminence in cooking is never attained under 80." He was premier artiste to Louis XVI, then to lord Sefton, then to the duke of York, then chef de cuisine at Crookford's. It is said that he quitted the earl of Sefton because one of his lordship's guests added pepper to his soup. He was succeeded by Francatelli.

* * Vatel, we are told, committed suicide (1671) during a banquet given by the prince de Condé, because the lobsters for the turbot sauce did not arrive in time.

Udolpho (The Mysteries of), a romance by Mrs Radcliffe (1790).

Ugo, natural son of Niccolo III of Ferrara. His father had for his second wife Parisina Malatesta, between whom and Ugo a criminal attachment arose. When Niccolo was informed thereof, he had both brought to open trial, and both were condemned to suffer death by the common headsman—Friszi, History of Ferrara.

Ugolin'o, count of Gheradesca, a leader of the Guelphs in Pisa. He was raised to the highest honours, but the archbishop Ruggieri incited the Pisans against him, his castle was attacked, two of his grandsons fell in the assault, and the count himself, with his two sons and two surviving grandsons, were imprisoned in the tower of the Gualandi, on the Piazza of the Anziani. Being locked in, the dungeon key was flung into the Arno, and all food was withheld from them. On the fourth day, his son Gaddo died, and by the sixth day little Anselm with the two grandchildren "fell one by one." Last of all the count died also (1288), and the dungeon was ever after called "The Tower of Famine."

Dante has introduced this story in his Inferno, and represents Ugolino as devouring most voraciously the head of Ruggieri, while frozen in the lake of ice. Chaucer, in his Canterbury Tales, makes the monk briefly tell this sad story, and calls the count "Ilugeline of Pise."

Oh thou Pisa, shame! What if I have Reported that thy castles were betrayed
By Ugolino yet no right hadst thou
To stretch his children on the rack
Their tender years incapable of guilt
Dante Hell xxxiii. (1300)

Remember Ugolino condescends
To eat the head of his arch-enemy
The moment after he politely ends
His tale.

Orlando Furioso* (1616)

Ulin, an enchantress, who had no power over those who remained faithful to Allah and their duty, but if any fell into error or sin, he had full power to do as he liked. Thus when Nizar Sultan of Delhi mistreated the protection of Allah, she transferred him into a toad.
When the vizier Horma believed a false report about his virtue, she transferred him also into a toad. At last when the prince Hemjush to avoid a marriage proposed by her father married with a stranger, her indiscretion placed her in the power of the enchantress, who transformed her likewise into a toad. Ulin was ultimately killed by Muzar Sultan of Delhi, who felled her to the ground with a blow—*Sir C.
Mordaunt [India], Tales of the Genii*,

Ulin, Fingal's son, called "the sweet voice of recumbent, Conn"

Ulin, the Irish name for Ulster

It was the name of a son of the hero Ulin who was killed by the hero Ulin.

Ulin's Daughter (Ulin), a young lady who eloped with the chief of Ulster Isle, and induced a boatman to row the over Lochgyle during a storm. The boatman was captured just as Lord Ulin and his retinue reached the shore. He saw the peril, he cried in agony, "Come back, come back! and I'll forgive your Highland chief!" but it was too late, the "waters wild rolled over his child, and he was left lamenting"—Campbell, Lord Ulin's Daughter (a ballad)

Lodh, ii*

Ulric, son of Werner (ie count of Siegendorf). With the help of Gabor, he saved the count of Strahlenheim from the Oder, but murdered him afterwards for the wrongs he had done his father and himself, especially in seeking to oust them of the princely inheritance of Siegendorf—Byron, Werner (1822)

Ulrica, in Charles XII, by J. R.
Planché (1826).

Ulrica, a girl of great beauty and noble determination of character, natural daughter of Ernest de Lidberg. Dressed in the clothes of Herman (the deaf and dumb jailer-lad), she gets access to the dungeon where her father is confined as a "prisoner of State," and contrives his escape, but he is recaptured. Whereupon Christine (a young woman in the "service" of the countess Marie) goes direct to Frederick II and obtains his pardon—Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1837).

Ulfagro, the fierce Dane, who massacred the Culdees of Iona, and having bound Aodh in iron, carried him to the church, demanding of him where he had concealed the church treasure. At that moment a mysterious gigantic figure in white appeared, and, taking Ulfagro by the arm, led him to the statue of St.
Columb, which instantly fell on him and killed him.

The tottering image was dashed
Down from its lofty pedestal;
On Ulfagro's helm it crashed,
Helmet and skull and flesh and brain
It crushed as millstones crush the grain.
Campbell, Teuclura.

Ulysses, a corrupt form of Odysseus [Odis'sure], the king of Ithica. He is one of the chief heroes in Homer's
Iliad, and the chief hero of the Odyssey.
Homer represents him as being craftily wily and full of devices. Virgil ascribes to him the invention of the Wooden Horse

Ulysses was very unwilling to join the expedition to Troy, and pretended to be mad. Thus, when Palamedes came to summon him to the war, he was sowing salt instead of barley.

Ulysses's Bow Only Ulysses could draw this bow, and he could shoot an arrow from it through twelve rings.

William the Conqueror had a bow which no arm but his own could bend.

Robin Hood's bow could be bent by no hand but his own.

* * Statius says that no one but Karpeneus [Karp' a nucc] could poise his spear

*His cypress spear with steel encircled shone
Not to be poised but by his hand alone.*

Ulysses and Polyphemos.

Ulysses and his crew, having reached the island of Sicily, strayed into the cave of Polyphemos, the giant Cyclops. Soon as the monster returned and saw the strangers, he seized two of them, and, having dashed out their brains, made his supper off them, "nor entrails left, nor yet their marrowy bones," then stretched his huge carcass on the floor, and went to sleep. Next morning, he caught up two others, devoured them for his breakfast, then stalked forth into the open air, driving his flocks before him. At sundown he returned, seized other two for his supper, and after quaffing three bowls of wine, fell asleep. Then it was that Ulysses bored out the giant's eye with a green olive stake heated in the fire. The monster roared with pain, and after searching in vain to seize some of his tormentors, removed the rock from the mouth of the cave to let out his goats and sheep. Ulysses and his companions escaped at the same time by attaching themselves to the bellies of the sheep, and made for their ship. Polyphemos hurled rocks at the vessel, and nearly succeeded in sinking it, but the fugitives made good their flight, and the blinded monster was left lamenting—Homer, Odyssey, 11.

* * An extraordinary parallel to this tale is told in the third voyage of Sindbad the sailor. Sindbad's vessel was driven by a tempest to an island of pygmies, and advancing into the interior the crew came to a "high palace," into which they entered. At sundown came home the giant, "tall as a palm tree; and in the middle of his forehead was one eye, red and fiery as a burning coal." Soon as he saw the intruders, he caught up the fattest of them and roasted him for his supper, then lay down to sleep, and "snored louder than thunder." At daybreak he left the palace, but at night returned, and made his meal off another of the crew. This was repeated a third night, but while the monster slept, Sindbad, with a red-hot spit, scooped out his eye. "The pain he suffered made him groan hideously," and he fumbled about the place to catch some of his tormentors "on whom to glut his rage," but not succeeding in this, he left the palace, "bellowing with pain." Sindbad and the rest lost no time in making for the sea, but scarcely had they pushed off their rafts when the giant approached with many others, and hurled huge stones at the fugitives. Some of them even ventured into the sea up to their waists, and every raft was sunk except the one on which Sindbad and two of his companions made their escape—Arabian Nights ("Sindbad the Sailor," third voyage).

Another similar tale occurs in the Basque legends, in which the giant's name is Tartaro, and his eye was bored out with spits made red hot. As in the previous instances, some seamen had inadvertently wandered into the giant's dwelling, and Tartaro had banqueted on three of them, when his eye was scooped out by the leader. This man, like Ulysses, made his escape by means of a ram, but, instead of clinging to the ram's belly, he fastened round his neck the ram's bell, and threw over his back a sheep-skin. When Tartaro laid his hand on the skin, the man left it behind and made good his escape.

That all these tales are borrowed from one source none can doubt. The Iliad of Homer had been translated into Syriac by Theophilus Edessenes, a Christian Maronite monk of mount Libanus, during the caliphate of Harun-ur-Rashid (A.D. 786-809)—See Notes and Queries, April 19, 1879.

Undine [Oon-deen], a water-sylph, who was in early childhood changed for the young child of a fisherman living on a peninsula near an enchanted forest One day, sir Huldbrand took shelter in the fisherman's hut, fell in love with Undine, and married her Being thus united to a man, the sylph received a soul.

Not long after the wedding, sir Huldbrand returned homeward, but stopped awhile in the city which lay on the other side of the forest, and met there Bertalda, a beautiful but haughty lady, whom they invited to go with them to their home, the Castle Ringstettin. For a time the knight was troubled with visions, but Undine had the mouth of a well closed up, and thus prevented the water-sprites from getting into the castle. In time, the knight neglected his wife and became attached to Bertalda, who was in reality the changeling. One day, sailing on the Danube, the knight rebuked Undine in his anger, and immediately she was snatched away by sister sylphs to her water home. Not long after, the knight proposed to Bertalda, and the wedding day arrived. Bertalda requested her maid to bring her some water from the well, so the cover was removed, Undine rose from the upheaving water, went to the chamber of sir Huldbrand, kissed him, and he died. They buried him, and a silver stream bubbled round his grave, it was Undine who thus embraced him, true in life and faithful in death—De la Motte Fouqué, Undine (1807)

Ur'sula (Sant), daughter of Dianotus king of Cornwall (brother and successor of Caradoc king of Cornwall) She was asked in marriage by Conan [Meriadoc] of Armorica or Little Britain Going to France with her maidens, the princess was driven by adverse winds to Cologne, where she and "her 11,000 virgins" were martyred by the Huns and Picts (October 21, 237) Visitors to Cologne are still shown piles of skulls and bones heaped in the wall, faced with glass, which the vcrger asserts to be the relics of the martyred virgins, but, like Iphis, they must have changed their sex since death, for most undoubtedly many of the bones are those of men and boys—See Geoffrey, British History, v 15, 16

A calendar in the Freisingen Codex notices them as "SS XI M VIRGINUM," i.e. "eleven holy virgin martyrs," but, by making the "M" into a Roman figure equal 1000, we have XIII = 11,000, so inc = 300

Ursula is the Swabian ursul or horsch ("the moon"), and, if this solution is accepted, then the "virgins who bore her company" are the stars Ursul is the Scandinavian Hulda

Drayton Polyolbion xxiv (1622)

Use of Pests David once said he could not imagine why a wise deity should have created such things as spiders, idiots, and mosquitos, but his life showed they were all useful to him at any rate Thus, when he fled from Sanl, a spider spun its web at the mouth of the cave, and Saul, feeling assured that the fugitive could not have entered the cave without breaking the web, passed on without further search Again, when he was taken captive before the king of Gath, he feigned idiocy, and the king dismissed him, for he could not believe such a driveller could be the great champion who had slain Goliath Once more, when he entered into the tent of Saul, as he was crawling along, Abner, in his sleep, tossed his legs over him David could not stir, but a mosquito happened to bite the leg of the sleeper, and, Abner shifting it, enabled David to effect his escape—The Talmud (See VIRGIL'S GRAMMAR, p 1071)

Dryden Polyolbion xiii (1613)

Vale'rio, a noble young Neapolitan lord, husband of Evanthi (3 syl). This chaste young wife was parted from her husband by Frederick, the licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples, who tried in vain to seduce her, and then offered to make her any one's wife for a month, at the end of which time the libertine should suffer death. No one would accept the offer, and ultimately the lady was restored to her husband — Beaumont and Fletcher, A Wife for a Month (1624)

Valerius, the hero and title of a novel by J G Lockhart (1821). Valerius is the son of a Roman commander settled in Britain. After the death of his father, he is summoned to Rome, to take possession of an estate to which he is the heir. At the villa of Capito he meets with Athanasia, a lady who unites the Roman grace with the elevation of the Christian. Valerius becomes a Christian also, and brings Athanasia to Britain. The display at the Flavian amphitheatre is admirably described. A Christian prisoner is brought forward, either to renounce his faith or die in the arena, of course, the latter is his lot.

This is one of the best Roman stories in the language.

Vanity Fair, a novel by W M Thackeray (1848). Becky (Rebecca) Sharp, the daughter of a poor painter, dashing, selfish, unprincipled, and very clever, contrives to marry Rawdon Crawley, afterwards his excellency colonel Crawley, C B, governor of Coventry Island. Rawdon expected to have a large fortune left him by his aunt, Miss Crawley, but was disinherited on account of his marriage with Becky, then a poor governess. Becky contrives to live in splendour on "nothing a year," gets introduced at court, and is patronized by lord Steyne earl of Gaunt, but this intimacy giving birth to a great scandal, Becky breaks up her establishment, and is reduced to the lowest Bohemian life. Afterwards she becomes the "female companion" of Joseph Sedley, a wealthy "collector," of Bogley Wollah, in India. Having insured his life and lost his money, he dies suddenly under very suspicious circumstances, and Becky lives for a time in splendour on the Continent. Subsequently she retires to Bath, where she assumes the character of a pious, charitable lady Bountiful, given to all good works. The other part of the story is connected with Amelia Sedley, daughter of a wealthy London stock-broker, who fails, and is reduced to indigence. Captain George Osborne, the son of a London merchant, marries Amelia, and old Osborne disinherits him. The young people live for a time together, when George is killed in the battle of Waterloo. Amelia is reduced to great poverty, but is befriended by captain Dobbin, who loves her to idolatry, and after many years of patience and great devotion, she consents to marry him. Becky Sharp rises from nothing to splendour, and then falls, Amelia falls from wealth to indigence, and then rises.

Veghantino [Val yan tee' no], Orlando's horse — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516). Also called Veillantif.

Velhingericht or Tur Holi Vehm, a secret tribunal of Westphalia, the principal seat of which was in Dortmund. The members were called "free judges." It took cognizance of all crimes in the lawless period of the Middle Ages, and those condemned by the tribunal were made away with by some secret means, but no one knew by what hand. Being despatched, the dead body was hung on a tree to advertise the fact and deter others. The tribunal existed at the time of Charlemagne, but was at its zenith of power in the twelfth century Sir W Scott has introduced it in his Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Was Rebecca guilty or not? The Vehmgericht of the servants' hall pronounced against her—Thackeray Fanny Hill xlv (1848)

Vehmique Tribunal (The), or the Secret Tribunal, or the court of the Holy Vehm, said to have been founded by Charlemagne—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Veil of St Agatha, a miraculous veil belonging to St Agatha, and deposited in the church of the city of Catania, in Sicily, where the saint suffered martyrdom "It is a sure defence against the eruptions of mount Etna" It is very true that the church itself was overwhelmed with lava in 1693, and some 20,000 of the inhabitants perished; but that was no fault of the veil, which would have prevented it if it could Happily, the veil was recovered, and is still believed in by the people

Veilchen (Annette), attendant of Anne of Geierstein—Sir W Scott, Anno of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Veiled Prophet of Khorassan (The), Hakim ben Allah, surnamed Mokanna or "The Veiled," founder of an Arabic sect in the eighth century. He wore a veil to conceal his face, which had been greatly disfigured in battle. He gave out that he had been Adam, Noah, Abraham, and Moses. When the sultan Mahadi marched against him, he poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself in a cask containing a burning acid, which entirely destroyed his body.

* * Thomas Moore has made this the subject of a poetical tale in his Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," 1817)

There on that throne sat the prophet-chief
The great Mokanna. O'er his features hung
The veil the silver veil which he had flung
In mien there to hide from mortal sight
His dazzling brow till man could bear its light.

Veipsey, an intermittent spring in Yorkshire, called "prophetic" because, when unusually high, it foretells a coming dearth

Then my prophetic spring at Velpsey I may show
That some years is dried up some years again doth flow;
But when it breaketh out with an immoderate birth
It tells the following year of a penurious dearth Dryden Polyolbion xxviii. (1622).

Velasquez, the Spanish governor of Portugal in 1640, when the people, led by don Juan duke of Braganza, rose in rebellion, shook off the Spanish yoke, and established the duke on the throne, under the name and title of Juan or John IV. The same dynasty still continues. Velasquez was torn to pieces by the mob. The duchess calls him a

Discerning villain
Subtle, insidious false and plausible
He can with ease assume all outward forms
While with the lynx's beam he penetrates
The deep reserve of every other breast.

Veneering (Mr), a new man, "forty, wavy-haired, dark, tending to corpulence, sly, mysterious, filmy, a kind of well-looking veiled prophet, not prophesying." He was a drug merchant of the firm of Chicksey, Stobbles, and Veneering. The two former were his quondam masters, but their names had "become absorbed in Veneering, once their traveller or commission agent."

Mrs Veneering, a new woman, "fair, aquiline-nosed and fingered, not so much light hair as she might have, gorgeous in raiment and jewels, enthusiastic, propitiatory, conscious that a corner of her husband's veil is over herself."

Mr and Mrs. Veneering were brand new people in a brand new house in a brand new quarter of London. Everything about the Veneerings was spick and span new. All their furniture was new, all their friends were new, all their servants were new, their plate was new, their carriage was new, their harness was new, their horses were new their pictures were new they themselves were new they were as newly married as was lawfully com-passible with their having a brand new baby.

In the veneering establishment, from the hall chairs with the new coat of arms to the grand pianoforte with the new action and up stairs again to the new fire-escape all things were in a state of high varnish and polish.—C. D. Lens, Our Mutual Friend, II. (1864)

Veneering of Society (The), flashy, rich merchants, who delight to overpower their guests with the splendour of their furniture, the provisions of their tables, and the jewels of their wives and daughters

Venerable Bede (The) Two accounts are given respecting the word venerable attached to the name of this "wise Saxon." One is this. On one occasion he preached to a heap of stones, thinking himself in a church, and the stones were so affected by his eloquence that they exclaimed, "Amen, venerable Bede!" This, of course, is based on the verse Luke xix 10

The other is that his scholars, wishing to honour his name, wrote for epitaph

Heaven in form,
Bede's prebiteria

but an angel changed the second line into "Bede venerabilis ossa" (672-735)

* * The chair in which he sat is still preserved at Jarrow. Some years ago a sailor used to show it, and always called it the chair of the "great admiral Bede."

Venerable Doctor (The), William de Champeaux (*-1121)

Venerable Initiator (The), William of Occam (1276-1347)

Venery Sir Tristram was the inventor of the laws and terms of venery. Hence a book of venery was called A Boob of Tristram

Of Sir Tristram came all the good terms of venery and of hunting, and the sizes and measures of blowing of an horn. And of him we had first all the terms of hawking, and which were beasts of chase and beasts of venery, and which were vermin, and all the blasts that belong to all manner of games. First to the uncoupling, to the seeking to the rebach to the flight, to the death, and to the stroke, and many other blasts and terms shall all manner of gentlemen have cause to the world's end to praise Sir Tristram and to pray for his soul.—Sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur II. 133 (1470)

Venice Glass The drinking-glasses of the Middle Ages made of Venice glass were said to possess the peculiar property of breaking into shivers if poison were put into them

Venice Preserved, a tragedy by T. Otway (1682). A conspiracy was formed by Renault a krenchman, Elliot an Englishman, Bedamar, Pierre, and others, to murder the Venetian senate. Jaffier was induced by his friend Pierre to join the conspirators, and gave his wife as hostage of his good faith. As Renault most grossly insulted the lady, Jaffier took her away, when she persuaded her husband to reveal the plot to her father Priuli, under the promise of a general amnesty. The senate violated the promise made by Priuli, and commanded all the conspirators except Jaffier to be broken on the wheel. Jaffier, to save his friend Pierre from the torture, stabbed him, and then himself. Belvidera went mad and died.

Venice of the East, Bangkok, capital of Siam

Venice of the North, Stockholm (Sweden). Sometimes Amsterdam is so called, from its numerous water-courses and the opulence of its citizens. It has 290 bridges.

They went to the city of Amsterdam, the Venice of the North.—The Dragonades I.

Ventid'ius, an Athenian imprisoned for debt. Timon paid his debt, and set him free. Not long after, the father of Ventid'ius died, leaving a large fortune, and the young man offered to refund the loan, but Timon declined to take it, saying that the money was a free gift. When Timon got into difficulties, he applied to Ventid'ius for aid, but Ventid'ius, like the rest, was "found base metal," and "denied him"—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens (1609).

Ventid'ius, the general of Marc Antony.

* * The master scene between Ventid'ius and Antony in this tragedy is copied from The Maid's Tragedy by (Beaumont and Fletcher), Ventid'ius being the "Melantius" of Beaumont and Fletcher's drama.—Dryden, All for Love or the World Well Lost (1678).

Ventriloquist The best that ever lived was Brabant, the engastrimith of Francois I of France.

Venus (Paintings of) VENUS ANADROMYNA or Venus rising from the sea and wringing her golden tresses, by Apelles. Apelles also put his name to a "Sleeping Venus." Tradition says that Campaspê (afterwards his wife) was the model of his Venus

THE RHODIAN VENUS, referred to by Campbell, in his Pleasures of Hope, II, is the Venus spoken of by Pliny, XXIV 10, from which Shakespeare has drawn his picture of Cleopatra in her barge (Antony and Cleopatra, act II sc 2) The Rhodian was Protog'enês

When first the Rhodian's mimic art arrayed
The queen of Beauty in her Cyprian shroud
The happy master mingled in his plea
Each look that charmed him in the fair of Greece
Love on the picture smiled Express ion poured
Her mingling spirit there and Greece adored.
Pleasures of Hope II. (1799)

Venus (Statues of) THE Cnidian Venus, a nude statue, bought by the Cnidians By Praxitélès

THE COIN VENUS, a draped statue, bought by the Coins By Praxitélès

THE VENUS DE' MEDICI, a statue dug up in several pieces at Hadrian's villa, near Tivoli (seventeenth century), and placed for a time in the Medici palace at Rome, whence its name It was the work of Cleom'ênês the Athenian All one arm and part of the other were restored by Bandinelli In 1680 this statue was removed to the Uffizi gallery at Florence It was removed to Paris by Napoleon, but was afterwards restored

THE VENUS OF ARLES, with a mirror in the right hand and an apple in the left This statue is ancient, but the mirror and apple are by Girardin

THE VENUS OF MILO The "Venus Victorious" is called the "Venus of Milo," because it was brought from the island of Milo, in the Ægean Sea, by admiral Dumont d'Urville in 1820 It is one of the chefs d'œuvre of antiquity, and is now in the Louvre of Paris

THE PAULINE VENUS, by Canova. Modelled from Pauline Bonaparte, princess Borghese

I went by chance into the room of the Pauline Venus my mouth will taste bitter all day How venal! how gaudy and vile she is with her gilded holsters! It is the most hateful thing that ever waxed marble.—Ouida Ariadne I 1

THE VENUS PANDEMOS, the sensual and vulgar Venus (Greek, pan-dēmos, for the vulgar or populace generally), as opposed to the "Uranian Venus," the beau-ideal of beauty and loveliness

Amongst the deities from the upper chamber a mortal came the light, lewd woman who had lured her charms to life for ever here in marble the counterfeit of the Venus Pandēmos.—Ouida Ariadne I 1

GIPSON'S VENUS, slightly tinted, was shown in the International Exhibition of 1872

Venus, the highest throw with the four tali or three tessera The best cast of the tali (or four-sided dice) was four different numbers, but the best cast of the tessera (or ordinary dice) was three sixes The worst throw was called caus —three aces in tessera and four aces in tali

Venus (The Isle of), a paradise created by "Divine Love" for the Lusitan heroes Here Uranian Venus gave Vasco da Gama the empire of the sea This isle is not far from the mountains of Imāus, whence the Ganges and Indus derive their source —Camões, Lusiad, I, (1572)

* * Similar descriptions of paradise are "the gardens of Alcēdōs" (Odyssey, vii), "the island of Circē" (Odyssey, x), Virgil's "Elysium" (Æneid, vi), "the island and palace of Aler'na" (Orlando Furioso, vi, vii), "the country of Logistilla" (Orlando Furioso, x), "Paradise," visited by Astolpho (Orlando Furioso, xxxiv), "the island of Armida" (Jerusalem Delivered), "the bower of Aerasia" (Fairy Queen), "the palace with its forty doors" (Arabian Nights, "Third Calender"), etc

Venus (Ura'man), the impersonation of divine love, the presiding deity of the Lusitans —Camões, Lusiad (1572)

Venus and Adonis Adonis, a most beautiful boy, was greatly beloved by Venus and Proserpine Jupiter decided that he should live four months with one and four months with the other goddess, and the rest of the year he might do what he liked One day, he was killed by a wild boar during a chase, and Venus was so inconsolable at the loss that the infernal gods allowed the boy to spend six months of the year with Venus on the earth, but the other six he was to spend in hell Of course, this is an allegory of the sun, which is six months above and six months below the equator

* * Shakespeare has a poem called Venus and Adonis (1593), in which Adonis is made cold and passionless, but Venus ardent and sensual

Venus of Cleom'enes (1 syl), now called the "Venus de' Medici" or "Venus de Medici"

Venus of the Forest (The) The ash tree is so called by Gilpin

Venusberg, the mountain of fatal delights Here Tannhäuser tarried, and when pope Urban refused to grant him absolution, he returned thither to be never more seen —Gerngh Legend

Ver'adone (2 syl), nephew to Champerlain the husband of Lamira — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647)

Verdugo, captain under the governor of Seville — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Pilgrim (1621)

Vere (Mr. Richard), lord of Illeshaw, a Jacobite conspirator

Miss Isabella Vere, the lord's daughter. She marries young Patrick Larnescliffe lord of Larnescliffe — Sir W. Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne)

Vere (Sir Arthur de), son of the earl of Oxford. He first appears under the assumed name of Arthur Philipson — Sir W. Scott Annals of Guernsey (time, Edward IV.)

Verges (2 syl), an old-fashioned constable and night-watch, noted for his blundering simplicity — Shakespeare, When As You See Nothing (1600)

Veigivian Sea, that part of St. George's Channel where tides out of the north and south seas meet. The Irish Sea is sometimes so called Leaves his cold waves into the narrower mouth of the Veigivian Sea, where meeting from the south Great Veigivian waves gather with their roiling shocks each other and shatter up against the grisly rocks. — Drayton, Polycricon 2. (161)

Veigob'retus, a dictator selected by the druids, and possessed of unlimited power both in war and state during times of great danger

This imaginary king or veigob'retus laid down his office at the end of the war — Dissertation on the Arts of Great Britain

Versopht (Lord Frederick), weak and silly, but far less vicious than his bear-leader, sir Mulberry Hawk. He drowled in his speech, and was altogether "very soft." Ralph Nickleby introduced his niece Kate to the young nobleman at a bachelor's dinner-party, hoping to make of the introduction a profitable investment, but Kate was far too modest and virtuous to aid him in his scheme — C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Vermilion Sea (The), the gulf of California

Vernon (Diana), niece of sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. She has great beauty, sparkling talents, an excellent disposition, high birth, and is an enthusiastic adherent of an exiled king. Diana Vernon marries Frank Osbaldistone

Sir Frederick Vernon, father of Diana, a political intriguer, called "his excellency the earl of Beanchamp." He first appears as father Vaughan [Vaughan] — Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Ver'olame (3 syl) or VERULAM, "a stately nymph" of Isis. Seeing her stream besmeared with the blood of St. Alban, she prayed that it might be diverted into another channel, and her prayer was granted. The place where St. Alban was executed was at that time called Holmhurst — Robert of Gloucester, Chronicle (in verse), 57 (thirteenth century)

A poetical account of this legend is also given by W. Browne in his Britannia's Pastorals, 11 (1613).

Veronica, the maiden who handed her handkerchief to Jesus on His way to Calvary. The "Man of sorrows" wiped His face with it, returned it to the maiden, and it ever after had a perfect likeness of the Saviour photographed on it. The handkerchief and the maiden were both called Veronica (i.e. vera iconica, "the true likeness")

One of these handkerchiefs is preserved in St. Peter's of Rome, and another in Milan Cathedral

Verrina, the republican who murders Pierro — Schiller, Inско (1783)

Versailles (The German), Casseel, so called from its gardens, conservatories, fountains, and colossal statue of Hercules

Versailles of Poland, the palace, etc., of the counts of Braniski, which now belong to the municipality of Bialystok

Versatile (Sir George), a scholar, pleasing in manners, warm-hearted, generous, with the seeds of virtue and the soul of honour, but being deficient in stability, he takes his colour, like the chameleon, from the objects at hand. Thus, with Maria Delaval he is manly, frank, affectionate, and noble, with lord Vibrate, hesitating, undecided, and tossed with doubts, with lady Vibrate, boastfulness, extravagant, and light-hearted. Sir George is betrothed to Maria Delaval, but the death of his father delays the marriage. He travels, and gives a fling to youthful indulgences. After a time, he meets Maria Delaval by accident, his better nature prevails, and he offers her his hand, his heart, his title, and his fortune — Holcroft, He's Much to Blame (1790).

Vertaigne (2 or 3 syl), a nobleman and judge, father of Lamira and Beaupré — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647)

Vervain or VERBENA, i e herba bona, used by the Greeks and Romans in their sacrifices and sacred rites, and by the druids in their incantations. It was for ages a reputed decoobstruent, especially efficacious in scrofulous complaints, the bite of rabid animals, antipathies, and megrims.

Drayton says "a wreath of vervain heralds wear" as a badge of truce. Ambassadors also wore a chaplet of vervain on denouncing war.

The hermit the holy vervain finds
Which he about his head that hath the megrim blinds.
Drayton Polyolbion, xlii. (1613)

Vesey (Sir John), a baronet, most worldly, wise, and, being poor, gives himself the nickname of "Stingy Jack," that he may be thought rich. Forthwith his £10,000 was exaggerated into £40,000. Sir John wanted his daughter to marry Alfred Evelyn, but, feeling very uncertain about the stability of the young man's money, shilly-shallied about it, and in the mean time, Georgina married Sir Frederick Blount, and Evelyn was left free to marry Clara Douglas, whom he greatly loved — Lord L. Bulwer Lytton, Money (1840).

Vestris, called "The God of Dancing," used to say, "Europe contains only three truly great men—myself, Voltaire, and Frederick of Prussia" (1729–1808).

Veto (Monsieur and Madame), Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette. The king had the power of putting his veto on any decree of the National Assembly (1791), in consequence of which he was nicknamed "Capet Veto."

 The name occurs in the celebrated song called La Carmagnole, which was sung to a dance of the same name.

Vetus, in the Times newspaper, is the nom de plume of Edward Sterling (1773–1847), "The Thunderer" (1812–13).

Vexheia, wife of Osmond, an old Varangian guard — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Wholes (1 syl), a lawyer who draws Richard Carstone into his toils. He is always closely buttoned up, and speaks in a lifeless manner, but is pre-eminently a "most respectable man" — C. Dickens, House (1852).

Vi et Armis. — Cicero, 2 Philippic, xli 107.

Vibrate (Lord), a man who can never make up his mind to anything, and, "like a man on double business bent, he stands in pause which he shall first begin, and both neglects." Thus, he would say to his valet, "Order the coachman at eleven. No, order him at one. Come back! order him in ten minutes. Stay! don't order him at all. Why don't you go and do as I bid you?" or, "Tell Harry to admit the doctor. No, not just yet, in five minutes. I don't know when. Was ever man so tormented?" So with every thing.

Lady Vibrate, wife of the above. Extravagant, contradictory, fond of gaiety, hurry, noise, embarrassment, confusion, disorder, uproar, and a whirl of excitement. She says to his lordship:

I am all gaiety and good humour, you are all turnmoll and timentation. I sing, laugh, and welcome pleasure wherever I find it. You take your lantern to look for misery, which the sun itself cannot discover. You may think proper to be as miserable as Job, but don't expect me to be a Job's wife — Act ii. 1.

Lady Jane Vibrate, daughter of lord and lady Vibrate. An amiable young lady, attached to Delaval, whom she marries — Holcroft, He's Much to Blame (1790).

Vicar of Bray (The). Mr Brome says the noted vicar was Simon Alleyn, vicar of Bray, in Berkshire, for fifty years. In the reign of Henry VIII he was catholic till the Reformation, in the reign of Edward VI he was calvinist, in the reign of Mary he was papist, in the reign of Elizabeth he was protestant. No matter who was king, he resolved to do the vicar of Bray — D'Israeli, Curiosities of Literature.

Another statement gives the name of Pendleton as the true vicar. He was afterwards rector of St Stephen's, Walbrook (Edward VI to Elizabeth).

Hady n says the vicar referred to in the song was Simon Symonds, who lived in the Commonwealth, and continued vicar till the reign of William and Mary. He was independent in the protectorate, episcopalian under Charles II, papist under James II, moderate protestant under William and Mary.

 The song called The Vicar of Bray was written in the reign of George I, by colonel Fuller or an officer in Fuller's regiment, and does not refer to Alleyn, Pendleton, or Symonds, but to some real or imaginary person who was vicar of Bray from Charles II. to George I. The first verse begins "In good king Charles's golden days," I was a zealous high-churchman Ver 2 "When royal James obtained the crown," I found the Church of Rome would fit my constitution Ver 3 "When William was our king declared," I swore to him allegiance Ver 4 "When gracious Anne became our queen," I became a tory Ver 5 "When George, in pudding-time came o'er," I became a whig And "George my lawful king shall be—until the times do alter"

I have had a long chase after the vicar of Bray on whom the proverb "Mr Fuller in his Norths takes no notice of him." I am informed it is Simon Allyn or Allen who was vicar of Bray about 1510 and died 1559—Eromé to Pascalins June 14 1730 (See Letters from the Dodelian II L 100)

Vicar of Wakefield (The), Dr Primrose, a simple-minded, pious clergyman, with six children He begins life with a good fortune, a handsome house, and wealthy friends, but is reduced to utter poverty without any fault of his own, and, being reduced like Job, like Job he is restored First, he loses his fortune through the rascality of the merchant who held it His next great sorrow was the elopement of his eldest daughter, Olivia, with squire Thornhill His third was the entire destruction by fire of his house, furniture, and books, together with the savings which he had laid by for his daughters' marriage portions His fourth was being incarcerated in the county jail by squire Thornhill for rent, his wife and family being driven out of house and home His fifth was the announcement that his daughter Olivia "was dead," and that his daughter Sophia had been abducted His sixth was the imprisonment of his eldest son, George, for sending a challenge to squire Thornhill His cup of sorrow was now full, and comfort was at hand (1) Olivia was not really dead, but was said to be so in order to get the vicar to submit to the squire, and thus obtain his release (2) His daughter Sophia had been rescued by Mr Burchell (sur William Thornhill), who asked her hand in marriage (3) His son George was liberated from prison, and married Miss Wilmot, an heiress (4) Olivia's marriage to the squire, which was said to have been informal, was shown to be legal and binding (5) The old vicar was released, re-established in his vicarage, and recovered a part of his fortune—Goldsmith, The Vicar of Wakefield (1766)

 This novel has been dramatized several times In 1819 it was performed in the Surrey Theatre, in 1823 it was turned into an opera, in 1850 Tom Taylor dramatized it, in 1878 W G Wills converted it into a drama of four acts, entitled Olivia

The real interest of the story lies in the development of the character of the amiable vicar so rich in heavenly so poor in earthly wisdom, possessing little for himself yet ready to make that little less whenever misery appeals to his compassion With enough of worldly vanity about him to show that he shares the weakness of our nature ready to be imposed upon by cosmogonies and fictitious bills of exchange and yet commanding by the simple and serene dignity of goodness, the respect even of the profligate.—Encyc Brit Art. Romance

Victor Amadeus (4 syl'), king of Sardinia (1665, 1675–1732), noted for his tortuous policy He was fierce, audacious, unscrupulous, and selfish, profound in dissimulation, prolific in resources, and a "breaker of vows both to God and man" In 1730 he abdicated, but a few months later wanted to regain the throne, which his son, Charles Emmanuel, refused to resign On again plotting to recover the crown, he was arrested by D'Ornca the prime minister, and died—R Brown, King Victor and King Charles Emmanuel

Victor's Library (St'), a library of trashy books, especially controversial divinity (See Library)—Rabelais, Pantagruel, II 7 (1533)

Victoria (Donna), the young wife of don Carlos Don Carlos had given to donna Laura (a courtesan) the deeds of his wife's estate, and Victoria, to get them back, dressed in man's apparel, assumed the name of Florio, and made love to Laura Having secured a footing, she introduced Gasper as the rich uncle of Victoria, and Gasper persuaded Laura that the deeds were wholly worthless, whereupon Laura tore them to pieces By this manoeuvre the estate was saved, and don Carlos rescued from ruin—Mrs Cowley, A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782)

Victoria Tower (The) The tower of the palace of Westminster is called "The Monarchy in Stone," because it contains, in chiselled kings and heraldic designs, the sculptured history of the British sovereigns

Victorious (The). Almanzor means "victorious" The caliph Almanzor was the founder of Bagdad

Thou too art fallen Bagdad city of peace!

Thou too hast had thy day!

Thy founder The Victorious.

Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, v 6 (1797).

Vienna, like Toledo, was at one time noted for its sword-blades

Gargantua gave Touchfaucet an excellent sword of a Vienna blade with a golden scabbard — Rabelais Gargantua I. 46 (1533)

Vienna (The archbishop of), chancellor of Burgundy — Sir W. Scott, Anne of Guernsey (time, Edward IV.)

Vifell, father of Viking, famous for being the possessor of Angurind's sword, the celebrated sword made in the East by dwarfs. Vifell won it from Bjorn Blatand, and killed with it the giant Iernhus, whom he cleft from head to waist with a single stroke. Vifell left it to Viking, Viking to Thorsten, and Thorsten to his son Iritthof. The hilt of the sword was gold, and the blade written with runes, which were dull in times of peace, but in war glittered, "red as the crest of a cock when he fighteth" — Tegner, Fritthof Saga, iii (1825)

Villalpando (Gaspar Cardillos de), a Spanish theologian, controversialist, and commentator (1505-1570)

Truly "replied the canon I am better acquainted with books of chivalry than with Villalpando's divinity" — Cervantes Don Quixote I. iv 17 (1605)

Ville Sonnante (La) Avignon is so called by Rabelais, from its numerous bell-towers

Ville'rus, in Davenant's Siege of Rhodas (1656)

Vincent de la Rosa, a boastful, vain, heartless adventurer, son of a poor labourer, who had served in the Italian wars. Coming to the village in which Leandra lived, he induced her to elope with him, and, having spoiled her of her jewels, money, and other valuables, deserted her, and she was sent to a convent till the affair had blown over

He wore a gay uniform bedecked with glass buttons and steel ornaments — to-day he dressed himself in one piece of finery and to-morrow in another. He would seat himself upon a bench under a large poplar and entertain the villagers with his travels and exploits, assuring them there was not a country in the whole world he had not seen nor a battle in which he had not taken part. He had slain more Moors than ever Tunis or Morocco produced and as to duels he had fought more than ever Gante had or Luna, Diego Garcia de Paredez, or any other notorious. — Don Quixote I. iv 20 (

Vincent'io, duke of Vienna. He delegates his office to Angelo, and leaves Vienna for a time, under the pretence of going on a distant journey, but, by assuming a monk's hood, he observes incognito the conduct of his different officers. Angelo tries to dishonour Isabella, but the duke re-appears in due time and rescues her, while Angelo is made to marry Marianna, to whom he was already betrothed — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

 Marianna was Angelo's wife by civil contract, or, as the duke says to her, "He is thy husband by pre-contract," though the Church had not yet sanctified the union and blessed it. Still, the duke says that it would be "no sin" in her to account herself his wife, and to perform towards him the duties of a wife. Angelo's neglect of her was "a civil offence," which would have been a "sin" if the Church had sanctified the union, but which, till then, was only a moral or civil offence. Marianna also considered herself Angelo's "wife," and calls him "her husband." This is an interesting illustration of the "civil contract" of matrimony long before "The Marriage Registration Act" in 1837

Vincent'io, an old gentleman of Pisa, in Shakespeare's comedy called The Taming of the Shrew (1593)

Vincentio, the troth-plight of Evadne, sister of the marquis of Colonna. Being himself without guile, he is unsuspicious, and when Ludovico, the traitor, tells him that Evadne is the king's wanton, he believes it and casts her off. This brings about a duel between him and Evadne's brother, in which Vincentio falls. He is not, however, killed, and when the villainy of Ludovico is brought to light, he re-appears and marries Evadne—Sheel, Evadne or The Statue (1820)

Vincentio (Don), a young man who was music mad, and said that the summum bonum of life is to get talked about. Like queen Elizabeth, he loved a "crash" in music, plenty of noise and fury. Olivia de Zuniga disgusted him by maintaining the jew's-harp to be the prince of musical instruments—Mrs Cowley, A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782)

Vingolf, the paradise of Scandinavian mythology

Ah Ingeborg how fair how near doth stand
Each earthly joy to two fond loving hearts!
If boldly grasped whene'er the time is ripe
It follows willingly and builds for them
A vingolf even here on earth below
Tegner Frithjof Saga viii. (1825)

Viola, sister of Sebastian, a young lady of Messaline. They were twins, and so much alike that they could be distinguished only by their dress. Viola and her brother were shipwrecked off the coast of Illyria, Viola was brought to shore by the captain, but her brother was left to shift for himself. Being a stranger in a strange land, Viola dressed as a page, and, under the name of Cesario, entered the service of Orsino duke of Illyria. The duke greatly liked his beautiful page, and, when he discovered her true sex, married her—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1602)

Viola and Hono'ra, daughters of general Archas "the loyal subject" of the great-duke of Muscovia—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Loyal Subject (1618)

Violante (4 syl), the supposed wife of don Henrique (2 syl) an uxorious Spanish nobleman—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Violante, the betrothed of don Alonzo of Alcazar, but given in marriage by king Sebastian to Henriquez. This caused Alonzo to desert and join the emperor of Barbary. As renegade he took the name of Dorax, and assumed the Moorish costume. In the war which followed, he saved Sebastian's life, was told that Henriquez had died in battle, and that Violante, who never swerved from his love, being a young widow, was free and willing to be his wife—Dryden, Don Sebastian (1630)

Violante, an attendant on the princess Anna Comnena—the story of—Sir W

Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Violante (4 syl), wife of Pietro (2 syl), and putative mother of Pompilia. Violante provided this suppositions child partly to please old Pietro, and partly to cheat the rightful heirs—R Browning, The Ring and the Book, ii

Violante (Donna), daughter of don Pedro, a Portuguese nobleman, who intends to make her a nun, but she falls in love with don Felix, the son of don Lopez. Isabella (sister of don Felix), in order to escape a hateful marriage, takes refuge with donna Violante (4 syl), who "keeps the secret" close, even at the risk of losing her sweetheart, for Felix discovers that a colonel Briton calls at the house, and supposes Violante to be the object of his visits. Ultimately, the mystery is cleared up, and a double marriage takes place—Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1714)

Mrs. Yates (in the last act) with Garrick as don Felix "was admirable. Felix thinking he has gone too far supplies himself to soothe his Violante. She turns from him and draws away her chair. he follows and she draws further away. At length by his winning entreating and enjoying she is gradually induced to melt, and finally makes it up with him. Her condescension was admirable. her dignity was great and lofty and when by degrees she laid aside her frown and her lips relaxed into a smile nothing could be more lovely and irresistible. It laid the whole audience as well as the lover at her feet.—William Goodwin.

Violenta, any young lady non-entity, one who contributes nothing to the amusement or conversation of a party. Violenta is one of the dramatis personæ of Shakespeare's All's Well that Ends Well, but she only enters once, and then she neither speaks nor is spoken to (1598) (See ROGERO, p. 839, third art.)

Violenta, the fairy mother who brought up the young princess who was metamorphosed into a white cat for refusing to marry Mignonet (a hideously misshapen fairy)—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682)

Violet, the ward of lady Arundel. She is in love with Norman the "sea-captain," who turns out to be the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, and heir to the title and estates—Lord Lytton, The Sea-Captain (1839)

Violet (Father), a sobriquet of Napoleon I., also called "Corporal Violet" (1769, 1804-1815, died 1821)

* * Violets were the flowers of the empire, and when, in 1879, the ex-empress Eugène was visited at Chislehurst by those who sympathized with her in the death of her son, "the prince imperial," they were worn as symbols of attachment to the imperial family of France. The name was given to Napoleon on his banishment to Elba (1815), and implied that "he would return to France with the violets."

Violet-Crowned City (The) Athens is so called by Aristophanes (1000-350) (see Equites, 1323 and 1329, and Acharnians, 637). Macaulay refers to Athens as "the violet-crowned city." Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes, and Greece, in Asia Minor, was called Ionia. Athens was the city of "Ion crowned its king," and hence was "the Ion crowned" or king Ion's city. Translating the word Ion into English, Athens was the "Violet-crowned" or king Violet's city. Of course, the pun is the chief point, and was quite legitimate in comedy.

Similarly, Paris is called the "city of lilies," by a pun between Louis and his (the flower-de-luce), and France is l'empire des lys or l'empire des Louis.

By a similar pun, London might be called "the noisy town," from lulid, "noisy."

Violetta, a Portuguese, married to Belfield the elder brother, but deserted by him. The faithless husband gets betrothed to Sophia (daughter of Sir Benjamin Dove), who loves the younger brother. Both Violetta and the younger brother are shipwrecked and cast on the coast of Cornwall, in the vicinity of squire Belfield's estate, and Sophia is informed that her "betrothed" is a married man. She is therefore free from her betrothal, and marries the younger brother, the man of her choice, while the elder brother takes back his wife, to whom he becomes reconciled. — R. Cumberland, The Brothers (1769).

Violin-Makers (The best) Gasparo di Salo (1560-1610), Nicholas Amati (1596-1684), Antonio Stradivari (1670-1737), Joseph A. Guarneri (1683-1745)

* * Of these, Stradivari was the best, and Nicholas Amati the next best.

The following are eminent, but not equal to the names given above — Joseph Steiner (1620-1667), Matthias Klotz (1650-1696) (See Otto, On the Violin).

Vipers According to Greek and Roman superstition, the female viper, after copulation, bites off the head of the male. Another notion was that young vipers came into the world by gnawing their way through the mother, and killing her.

The viper like their parents they devour
For all lower's children easily covet power
Lord Brooke Treatise on Human Learning (1534-1628)

Vipont (Sir Ralph de), a knight of St John. He is one of the knights challengers — Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I).

Virgil, in the Gesta Romanorum, is represented as a mighty but benevolent enchanter, and this is the character that Italian romances give him.

Similarly, Sir Walter Scott is called "The Great Wizard of the North."

Virgil, in Dante, is the personification of human wisdom, Beatrice of the wisdom which comes of faith, and St Bernard of spiritual wisdom. Virgil conducts Dante through the Inferno and through Purgatory too, till the seven P's (peccata "sins") are obliterated from his brow, when Beatrice becomes his guide. St Bernard is his guide through a part of Paradise. Virgil says to Dante:

What reason here discovers I have power
To show thee that which lies beyond expect
From Beatrice — faith not reason's task
Dante Purgatory xviii. (1308)

Virgil The inscription on his tomb (said to have been written by himself) was Virgil of our Dramatic Poets (The) Ben Jonson is so called by Dryden (1574-1637).

Shakespeare was the Homer or father of our dramatic poets. Jon on was the Virgil and pattern of elaborate writing. I admire rare Ben but I love Shakespeare — Dryden

Virgil of the French Drama (Tr.) Jean Racine is so called by Sir Walter Scott (1797-1832)

Virgil's Courtship Geoffrey Chaucer has told us in Anno that Virgil the poet once made proposals to a lady of high rank in the Roman court, who rejected him for his presumption. She told him that if he would appear on a given night before her window, he should be drawn up in a basket. Accordingly he left his apartment, came into the street, and, being drawn up, was seen from the ground, was let down, and died a few days after, of grief. (See Chaucer's Works, p. 101)

Virgil's Gnat (the G.), according to Virgil, Aeschylus, having fallen asleep in the open air, was at the point of death, the price of a servant when a great sting hummed over his head. The shepherd cried the gnat! At the same time started the servant, which the shepherd saw and bent to catch. Next night, the price appeared to the shepherd in a dream, and reproached him for his rude interference. He raised a monument in honour of his deliverer, saying he was the first of his nation, which he calls the G. (See Virgil's Works, p. 101)

Virgilio au Rabot (Tr.), "The Virgil of the Plough," Adam Bell-out, the journeyman, who died 1652. He was patronized by Richelieu, patronized by the "Great Court," and praised by Pierre Corneille.

Virgin Knot, maidenly chastity, the allusion being to the zones worn by marriageable young women. Girls did not wear a zone and were therefore called "Ungirded" (dis-aster)

It is said that Peter Lillo, in 180, was the first to introduce imitations to the Virgin

Virgin Martyr (Tr.), a tragedy by Philip Massinger (1622)

Virgin Mary (The) is addressed by the following titles — "Impress and Queen of Heaven," "Impress and Queen of Angels," "Impress and Queen of the Earth," "Lady of the Universe or of the World," "Mistress of the World," "Patroness of all Men," "Advocate for Sinners," "Mediatrice," "Gate of Paradise," "Mother of Mercies and of Divine Grace," "Godde," "The only Hope of Sinners," etc., etc.

It is said that Peter Lillo, in 180, was the first to introduce imitations to the Virgin

Virgin Modesty John Wilmot, earl of Rochester, was so called by Charles II, because of his propensity to blushing (1617-1680)

Virgin Queen (Tr.), Elizabeth (1533, 1558-1603)

Virgin Unmasked (Tr.), a farce by H. Fielding. Goodwill had acquired by trade £10,000, and resolved to give his daughter Lucy to one of his relations, in order to keep the money in the family. He sent for her bachelor relations, and told them his intention, they were Blister (the apothecary), Coupee (the dancing-master), and Quaver (the singing-master). They all preferred their professions to the young lady, and while they were quarrelling about the superiority of their respective callings, Lucy married Thomas the footman. Old Goodwill says, "I don't know but that my daughter has made a better choice than if she had married one of these booby relations"

Virgins (The Eleven Thousand) Ursul or Hürsel in Swabia, like Hulda in Scandinavia, means "the moon," and her eleven thousand virgins are the stars. The bones shown in Cologne as those of the eleven thousand virgins are those of males and females of all ages, and were taken from an old Roman cemetery across which the wall of Cologne ran (1106)

Virginia, a young Roman plebeian of great beauty, decoyed by Appius Claudius, one of the decemvirs, and claimed as his slave. Her father, Virginius, being told of it, hastened to the forum, and arrived at the moment when Virginia was about to be delivered up to Appius. He seized a butcher's knife, stabbed his daughter to the heart, rushed from the forum, and raised a revolt.

This has been the subject of a host of tragedies. In French, by Mairet (1628), by Leclerc (1645), by Campistron (1683), by La Beaumelle (1760), by Chabanon (1769), by Laharpe (1786), by Leblanc du Guillet (1786), by Guiraud (1827), by Latour St Ybars (1845), etc. In Italian, by Alfieri (1783). In German, by Gotthold Lessing (eighteenth century). In English, by John Webster, entitled Appius and Virginia (1654), by Miss Brooke (1760), J. S. Knowles (1820), Virginius.

It is one of Lord Macaulay's lays (1842), supposed to be sung in the forum on the day when Sextus and Licinius were elected tribunes for the fifth time.

Virginia, the daughter of Mde de la Tour Madame was of a good family in Normandy, but, having married beneath her social position, was tabooed by her family. Her husband died before the birth of his first child, and the widow went to live at Port Louis, in the Mauritius, where Virginia was born. Their only neighbour was Margaret, with her love-child Paul, an infant. The two children grew up together, and became strongly attached, but when Virginia was 15 years old, her wealthy great-aunt adopted her, and requested that she might be sent immediately to France, to finish her education. The "aunt" wanted her to marry a French count, and, as Virginia refused to do so, disinherited her and sent her back to the Mauritius. When within a cable's length of the island, a hurricane dashed the ship to pieces, and the corpse of Virginia was cast on the shore. Paul drooped, and died within two months.—Bernardin de St Pierre, Paul et Virginie (1788).

* * In Cobb's dramatic version of this story, Virginia's mother is of Spanish origin, and dies committing Virginia to the charge of Dominique, a faithful old negro servant. The aunt is donna Leonora de Guzman, who sends don Antonio de Guardes to bring Virginia to Spain, and there to make her his bride. She is carried to the ship by force, but scarcely is she set on board when a hurricane dashes the vessel to pieces. Antonio is drowned, but Virginia is rescued by Alhambrin, a runaway slave, who has befriended her. The drama ends with the marriage between Virginia and Paul (1756-1818).

Virginius, father of the Roman Virginia, the title of a tragedy by S. Knowles (1820). (For the tale, see VIRGINIA.)

Macready (1793-1873) made the part of "Virginius" in Knowles's drama so called, but the first to act it was John Cooper, in Glasgow (1820).

Voluspa Saga (The), the prophecy of Völva. It contains between 200 and 300 verses, and resembles the Sibylline books of ancient Rome. The Voluspa Saga gives, in verse, a description of chaos, the formation of the world, the creation of all animals (including dwarfs and giants, gnomes and devils, fairies and goblins), the final conflagration of the world, and its renewal, when it will appear in celestial beauty, like the new Jerusalem described in the book of the Pentateuch.

Vorst (Peter's), the sleeping sentinel at Powys Castle.—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (t. me, Henry II.)

Vortigern, consul of the Gewisseans, who crowned Constantine King of Britain, although he was a monk, but treacherously contrived to get him assassinated afterwards, and then usurped the crown. He married Rowena's daughter of Hengist, and was burnt to death in a tower set on fire during a siege by Ambrosius.—Geoffrey, British History, vi. 6, viii. 1 (1142).

Vortigern, a drama put forward by Henry W. Ireland (1796) as a newly discovered play by Shakespeare. It was brought out at Drury Lane Theatre by John Kemble. Dr. Parr declared it to be his opinion that the play was genuine.

Mr. Ireland wrote to Mrs. F. Adams: "Altogether a poor play, confined to the British Isles, and the only interest it has is that it can only be read by the few who will read it."—Edinburgh Review, 1813, p. 117.

Vortigern and Hengist. The account of the massacre of the Long-Knives, given by Geoffrey, in his British History, vi. 15, differs greatly from that of the Welsh Triads (see STORY OF THE TRIADS, p. 917). Geoffrey says that Hengist came over with a large army, at which King Vortigern was alarmed. To allay this suspicion, Hengist promised to send back all the men that the king did not require, and begged Vortigern to meet him in conference at Ambrosius (Ambrosbury), on May-day. Hengist, in the mean time, secretly armed a number of his soldiers with "long knives," and told them to fall on the Britons during the conference, when he uttered the words, "Nemet oure Saxas." This they did, and 160 "barons and consuls" fell. It does not appear from this narrative that the slaughter was due "to the treachery of Vortigern," but was wholly the work of Hengist. Geoffrey calls the earl of Gloucester "Idol," and not "Didol."

Vortigern's Tower, like Pencil-ope's web, is a work ever beginning and never ending. Vortigern was told by his magicians to build a strong tower for his own security, so he commanded his workmen to build one on mount Ebor, but whatever they built one day was wholly swallowed up by the earth during the night.—Geoffrey, British History, vi. 17 (1142).

Vos non Vobis. The tale is that Virgil wrote an epigram on Augustus Caesar, which so much pleased the emperor that he desired to know who was the author. As Virgil did not claim the lines, one Bathyllus declared they were his. This displeased Virgil, and he wrote these four words, Sic vos non vobis four times at the commencement of four lines, and Bathyllus was requested to finish them. This he could not do, but Virgil completed the lines thus:

*Sic vos non vobis diffinitur arces;
Sic vos non vobis villas fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificas apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves.*

Not for yourselves ye new ye song birds build
Not for yourselves ye sheep your flocks bear
Not for yourselves your flocks ye bees have filled
Not for yourselves ye oxen draw the share

Vran (Bendige d, i.e. "Ble-sed"), King of Britain and father of Caradawc (Caradurus). He was called "Ble-sed" because he introduced Christianity into this island. Vran had shared the captivity of his son, and had learned the Christian faith during his seven years' detention in Rome.

Vran or Vran the Blessed son of Llŷr first brought the faith of Christ to the nation of the Cymry from Rome where he was seven years a hostage for his son Caradawc whom the Romans made prisoner through craft and the treachery of Angwedd Bendige (Caradurandus).—Welsh Triads, 1177.

He is called Ferran, son of Landfusa, by Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso

MEGISTOGON was only vulnerable at one tuft of hair on his head A woodpecker revealed the secret to Hiawatha, who struck him there and killed him — Longfellow, Hiawatha, ix

ORILLO was impervious to death unless one particular hair was cut off, wherefore Astolpho, when he encountered the robber, only sought to cut off this magic hair — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso

ORLANDO was invulnerable except in the sole of his foot, and even there nothing could injure him except the prick of a pin — Italian Classic Fable

SIEGFRIED was invulnerable except in one spot between the shoulders, on which a leaf stuck when he dipped his body in dragon's blood — The Nibelungen Lied

 The Promethæan unguent rendered the body proof against fire and wounds of any sort Medea gave Jason some of this unguent — Classic Story

Vulture (The Black), emblem of the ancient Turk, as the crescent is of the modern Ottoman empire

And that black vulture which with dreadful wing
Oershadows half the earth whose dismal flight
Frightened the Nuses from their native spring
Already stoops, and flaps with weary wing
Phineas Fletcher The Purple Island vii (1633)

Vulture Hopkins John Hopkins was so called from his rapacious mode of acquiring money He was the architect of his own fortune, and died worth £300,000 (in 1732)

 Pope refers to John Hopkins in the lines

When Hopkins dies a thousand lights attend
The wretch who living saved a candle end.

W

Wabster (Michael), a citizen of Perth — Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Wabun, son of Mudjeewis, the Indian Apollo He chases darkness over hill and dale with his arrows, wakes man, and brings the morning He married Wabun-Annung, who was taken to heaven at death, and became the morning star — Longfellow, Hiawatha (1855)

Wabun-Annung, the morning star, a country maiden who married Wabun the Indian Apollo — Longfellow, Hiawatha (1855)

Wackbarn (Mr), the schoolmaster at Libberton — Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Wackles (Mrs and the Misses), of Chelsea, keepers of a "Ladies' Seminary" English grammar, composition, geography, and the use of dumb-bells, by Miss Melissa Wackles, writing, arithmetic, dancing, music, and general fascination, by Miss Sophy Wackles, needlework, marking, and samplers, by Miss Jane Wackles, corporal punishment and domestic duties by Mrs Wackles Miss Sophy was a fresh, good-natured, buxom girl of 20, who owned to a soft impeachment for Mr Swaveller, but as he held back, she married Mr Cheggs, a well-to-do market gardener — C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop, viii (1840)

Wade (Miss), a handsome young woman, brought up by her grandmother, with a small independence She looked at every act of kindness, benevolence, and charity with a jaundiced eye, and attributed it to a vile motive Her manner was suspicious, self-secluded, and repellent, her temper proud, fiery, and unsympathetic Twice she loved—in one case she jilted her lover, in the other she was herself jilted The latter was Henry Gowan, who married Pet the daughter of Mr Meagles, and in consequence of this marriage, Miss Wadswode hated Gowen, his wife, the Meagleses, and all their friends. She enticed Intty-corn away from Mr Meagles, and the two beautiful young women lived together for a time, nursing their hatred of man to keep it warm — C Dickens, Little Dorrit, II 21 (1857)

Wadman (Widow), a comely widow, who would full fain secure uncle Toby for her second husband. Amongst other wiles, she pretends to have something in her eye, and gets uncle Toby to look for it. As the kind-hearted hero of Namur does so, the gentle widow gradually places her face nearer and nearer the captain's mouth, under the hope that he will kiss and propose — Sterne, The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759)

Wa'gemín (3 syl), the cry of the young lads and lasses of the North American tribes, when in harvesting they light upon a crooked and milderew ear of maize, emblematic of old age

And whence or a youth or maiden
Found a crooked ear in looking Bilched, milderew, or milderew
Then they laighed at danc together
Crept and slung about the corn fields
Milderew in their ear and features
For a owl man bent almost double Fingling slings or the other

Wagemin the thief of corn fields!
Lansdowne Illustrations xiii (1850)

Wagner, the faithful servant and constant companion of Faust, in Marlowe's drama called The Life and Death of Dr Faustus (1589), in Goethe's Faust (German, 1799), and in Gounod's opera of Faust (1859)

Wagner is a type of the pedant. He sacrifices himself to books as Faust does to knowledge — the dist of sollos is his element, parchment the source of his inspiration

He is one of those who in the presence of Niagara would see you with questions about arrow headed in scribbles — or the origin of the Pelag. — Lewis

Wa'hela, Lot's wife, who was confederate with the men of Sodom, and gave them notice when a stranger came to visit her husband. Her sign was smoke by day and fire by night. Wahela was turned into a pillar of salt — Jallalo'ddin, Al Zamakh

Wa'ila (3 syl), wife of Noah, who told the people her husband was distraught

The wife of Noah (Wa'ila) and the wife of Lot (Wa'hela) were both unbelievers — and it shall be said unto them at the last day. Enter ye into hell fire, with those who enter therein. — Al Gordin lxxi.

Wainamoinen, the Orpheus of Finnish mythology. His magic harp performed similar wonders to that of Orpheus (2 syl). It was made of the bones of a pike, that of Orpheus was of tortoiseshell. The "beloved" of Wainamoinen was a treasure called Sampo, which was lost as the poet reached the verge of the realms of darkness, the "beloved" of Orpheus was Lurid'icé, who was lost just as the poet reached the confines of earth, after his descent into hell

 See Kalevala, Rune, xxi. It is very beautiful. An extract is given in Baring Gould's Myths of the Middle Ages, 140-411

Waistcoat (The M B), the clerical waistcoat. M B means "Mark [of the] Beast". These waistcoats are so called because they were first worn (in the middle of the nineteenth century) by clergymen who were supposed to have popish tendencies

Waitwell, the lackey of Edward Mirrabell, and husband of Foible governess of the household of lady Wishfort. By his master's request, Waitwell personates sir Roland, and makes love to lady Wishfort, but the trick is discovered before much mischief is done — W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Wakefield (Harry), the English drover killed by Robin Oig — Sir W Scott, The Two Drovers (time, George III)

Wakoman (Sir George), physician to Henrietta Maria queen of Charles I — Sir W Scott, Peril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Walbeck (Perlin) assumed himself to be Richard duke of York, the younger son of Edward IV, supposed to be murdered by order of Richard III in the Tower

Parallel Instances. The youngest son of Ivan IV of Russia was named Dimitri, i.e. Demetrius. He was born in 1581, and was mysteriously assassinated in 1591, some say by Godonov the successor to the throne. Several impostors assumed to be Dimitri, the most remarkable appeared in Poland in 1603, who was recognized as czar in 1605, but perished the year following

Martin Guerre, in the sixteenth century, left his wife, to whom he had been married ten years, to join the army in Spain. In the eighth year of his absence, one Arnaud du Tilh assumed to be Martin Guerre, and was received by the wife as her husband. For three years he lived with her, recognized by all her friends and relations, but the return of Martin himself dispelled the illusion, and Arnaud was put to death.

The great Tiehborne case was a similar imposition. One Orton assumed to be sir Roger Tiehborne, and was even acknowledged to be so by sir Roger's mother, but after a long and patient trial it was proved that the claimant of the Tiehborne estates was no other than one Orton of Wapping.

In German history, Jakob Rehback, a miller's man, assumed, in 1345, to be Waldemar, an Ascanian margraf. Jakob was a menial in the service of the margraf.

Waldeck (Martin), the miner, and hero of a story read by Lovel to a picnic party at the ruins of St. Ruth's Priory — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Waldegrave (2 syl), leader of the British forces, which joined the Hurons in extirpating the Snake Indians, but he fell in the fray (pt. 1, 18).

Juha Waldegrave, wife of the above. She was bound to a tree with her child by some of the Indians during the attack. Outalissi, a Snake Indian, unbound them, took them home, and took care of them, but the mother died. Her last request was that Outalissi would carry her child to Albert of Wyoming, her friend, and beg him to take charge of it.

Henry Waldegrave, the boy brought by Outalissi to Albert. After staying at Wyoming for three years, his English friends sent for him (he was then 12 years old). When grown to manhood, he returned to Wyoming, and was married to Gertrude, but three months afterwards Outalissi appeared, and told them that Brandt was coming with his English soldiers to destroy the village. Both Albert and Gertrude were shot in the attack, and Henry joined the army of Washington — Campbell, Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

* * Campbell accents Wyoming on the first syllable, but the accent is generally thrown on the second.

Waldemar Fitzurse (Lord), a baron following prince John of Anjou (brother of Richard Cœur de Lion) — Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Waldstetten (The countess of), a relative of the baron. He is one of the characters in Donnerhugel's narrative — Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Wales. Geoffrey says, after the famine and pestilence which drove Cudwallader into Armorica (Bretagne), the people were no longer called Britons but Gualenses, a word derived either from Gualo their leader, or Guales their queen, or from their barbarism — British History, xii, 19 (1142).

* * Milner says the Welsh are those driven west by the Teutonic invaders and called Walisc-men ("strangers or foreigners"); Corn-wall was called "West Wales," and subsequently the Corn (Latin, cornu) or horn held by the Walls — Geography.

The Saxon wealh, plu. wealhas or wealas, "foreigners," meaning "not of Saxon origin," and also "slaves or subjugated men," is the correct origin of the word.

Wales (South). At one time the whole eastern division of South Wales was called Gwent, but in its present restricted sense the word Gwent is applied to the county of Monmouth only.

Walk (Knave) is meant for colonel Hewson, generally called "Walk, Knave, Walk," from a tract written by Edmund Gavton, to satirize the party, and entitled Walk, Knaves, Walk — S. Butler, Hudibras (1663-78).

Walker (Dr), one of the three great quacks of the eighteenth century, the others being Dr. Roek and Dr. Timothy Franks. Goldsmith, in his Citizen of the World, has a letter (LXXVI) wholly upon these three worthies (1759).

Walker (Helen), the prototype of Jeanie Deans. Sir W. Scott caused a tombstone to be erected over her grave in Irongray churchyard, Kirkeudbright [He koo' bry].

Walker (Hookey), John Walker, out-door clerk to Longman, Clements, and Co., Cheapside. He was noted for his hooked nose, and dished for his official duties, which were to see that the men came and left at the proper hour, and that they worked during the hours of work. Of course, the men conspired to throw discredit on his reports, and hence when any one draws the "long-bow," the hearer exclaims, "Hookey Walker!" as much as to say, "I don't believe it."

Walking Gentleman (A). Thomas Colley Grattan published his Highways and Byways under this signature (1825).

Walking Stewart, John Stewart, an English traveller, who walked through Hindustan, Persia, Nubia, Abyssinia, the Arabian Desert, Europe, and the North American states, "crazy beyond the reach of hellebore, yet sublime and divinely benignant. He had seen more of the earth's surface, and had communicated more with the children of the earth, than any man before or since"—De Quincey (1856)

Walking-Stick (Henry VIII's), the great Danish club shown in the armoury of the Tower

Wallangshaw (Mrs.), mistress of the chevalier Charles Edward the Young Pretender—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Wallace's Larder, the dungeon of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire, where Wallace had the dead bodies thrown when the garrison was surprised by him in the reign of Edward I.

"Douglas's Larder" is a similar phrase, meaning that horrible compound of dead bodies, barrels of flour, meal, wheat, malt, wine, ale, and beer, all mixed together in Douglas Castle by the order of lord James Douglas, when, in 1306, the garrison was surprised by him.

Wallenrode (The earl of), an Hungarian crusader—Sir W. Scott, The Hussar (time, Richard I.)

Waller, in love with Lady Lady'smaid to Widow Green. His love at first was not honourable, because his aristocratic pride revolted at the inferior social position of Lady's, but when he knew her real worth, he loved her, proposed marriage, and found that she was the sister of Truworth, who had taken service to avoid an obnoxious marriage—S. Knowles, The Love-Chase (1837)

Waller's Plot, a plot organized, in 1649, by Waller the poet, against the parliamentary party. The object was to secure the king's children, to seize the most eminent of the parliamentarians, to capture the Tower, and resist all taxes imposed for the support of the parliamentary army.

Walley (Pichard), the regicide, whose story is told by major Bridgenorth (a roundhead) at his dinner-table—Sir W. Scott, Peril of the Peal (time, Charles II.)

Wallflowers, young ladies in a hall-room, who have no partners, and who sit or stand near the walls of the ball-room.

Walnut Tree Fuller says "A walnut tree must be manured by beating, or else it will not bear fruit." Falstaff makes a similar remark on the camomile plant, "The more it is trodden on, the faster it grows." The almond and some other plants are said to thrive by being bruised.

A woman, a spangle and walnut tree
The more you beat them the better they be
Taylor the water poet" (1630)

Walnut Web When the three princes of a certain king were sent to find out "a web of cloth which would pass through the eye of a fine needle," the White Cat furnished the youngest of the three with one spun by the cats of her palace.

The prince took out of his box a walnut which he cracked and saw a small hazel nut, which he cracked also and found therein a kernel of wax. In this kernel of wax was hidden a single grain of wheat, but in the grain a small millet seed. On opening the millet he drew out a web of cloth 400 yards long and in it was woven all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes, fruits and flowers, the sun, moon and stars, the portraits of kings and queens, and many other wonderful designs.—Comte de Launoy Fairy Tales (The White Cat, 1653.)

Walsingham, the affianced of Helen Mowbray. Deceived by appearances, he believed that Helen was the mistress of lord Alunree, and abandoned her, but when he discovered his mistake, he married her—S. Knowles, Woman's Wit, etc (1838)

Walsingham (Lord), of queen Elizabeth's court—Sir W. Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Walter, marquis of Saluzzo, in Italy, and husband of Griselda, the peasant's daughter (qv)—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Clerk's Tale," 1388)

* * * This tale, of course, is allegorical, lord Walter takes the place of deity, and Griselda typifies the true Christian. In all her privations, in all her sorrows, in all her trials, she says to her lord and master, "Thy will be done."

Walter (Master), "the hunchback," guardian of Julia. A worthy man, liberal and charitable, frank and honest, who turns out to be the earl of Rochdale and father of Julia—S. Knowles, The Hunchback (1831).

Walter [Furst], father-in-law of Tell—Rossini, Guglielmo Tell (opera, 1829)

Waltham's Calf (As wise as), a thorough fool. This calf, it is said, ran nine miles when it was hungry to get suckled by a bull.

John Skelton, Colyn Clout (time Henry VIII.)

Waltheof (The abbot), abbot of St Withold's Priory — Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Waltheof (Father), a grey friar, confessor to the duchess of Rothesay — Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Walton (Lord), father of Elvira, who promised his daughter in marriage to sir Richard Forth, a puritan officer, but Elvira had already plighted her love to lord Arthur Talbot, a cavalier. The betrothal was set aside, and Elvira married Arthur Talbot at last — Bellini, Il Puritani (opera, 1834)

Walton (Sir John de), governor of Douglas Castle — Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I)

Wamba, "the son of Witless," the jester of Cedric the Saxon of Rotherwood — Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Wampum, a string or belt of whelk-shells, current with the North American Indians as a medium of exchange, and always sent as a present to those with whom an alliance or treaty is made

Peace be to thee! my words this belt approve.

Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming l. 14 (1809)

Our wampum league thy brethren did embrace.
Ditto l. 15

Wanderers It is said that gypsies are doomed to be wanderers on the face of the earth, because they refused hospitality to the Virgin and Child when the holy family fled into Egypt (See WILD HUNTSMAN) — Aventinus, Annalium Boiorum, libri septem (1554)

Wandering Jew (The), Kartaphilos (in Latin Cartaphilus), the door-keeper of the judgment hall, in the service of Pontius Pilate. The tradition is that this porter, while haling Jesus before Pilate, struck Him, saying, "Get on faster!" whereupon Jesus replied, "I am going fast enough, but thou shalt tarry till I come again"

 The earliest account of this tradition is in the Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St Alban's, copied and continued by Matthew Paris (1228). In 1242 Philip Mouskes, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote the "rhymed chronicle"

Kartaphilos, we are told, was baptized by Ananias, who baptized Paul, and received the name of Joseph — See Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St Alban's

Another tradition says the Jew was Ahasuerus, a cobbler, and gives the story thus: Jesus, overcome by the weight of the cross, stopped at the door of Ahasuerus, when the man pushed Him away, saying, "Be off with you!" Jesus replied, "I am going off truly, as it is written, but thou shalt tarry till I come again"

 This legend is given by Paul von Itzen, bishop of Schleswig, in 1547 — See Greve, Memoirs of Paul von Itzen, Hamburg (1744)

In Germany, the Wandering Jew is associated with John Buttadeus, who was seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, and at Brussels in 1774

 Leonard Doldius of Nurnberg, in his Praxis Alchymiae (1604), says the Jew Ahasuerus is sometimes called Buttadeus. In France, the name given to the Jew is Isaac Laquedem or Lakedion

 See Mitternacht, Dissertation in Johan, xxi 19

Salathiel ben Sadi is the name of the Wandering Jew in Croly's novel entitled Salathiel (1827)

Eugene Sue introduces a Wandering Jew in his novel called Le Juif Errant (1845). Galt has also a novel called The Wandering Jew

Poetical versions of the legend have been made by A W von Schlegel, Die Warnung, by Schubert, Ahasuer, by Goethe, Aus Meinem Leben, all in German. By Mrs Norton, The Undying One, in English, etc. The legend is based on St John's Gospel xxi 22 "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" The apostles thought the words meant that John would not die, but tradition has applied them to some one else

Wandering Knight (The), Fl Donzel del Febo ("the Knight of the Sun"), is so called in the Spanish romance entitled The Mirror of Knighthood. Eumen'edès is so called in Peele's Old Wives' Tale (1590)

Wandering Willie, the blind fiddler, who tells the tale about sir Robert Redgauntlet and his son sir John — Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Wandering Wood, which contained the den of Error. Error was a monster, like a woman upwards, but ending in a huge dragon's tail with a venomous sting. The first encounter of the Red Cross

Knight was with this monster, whom he slew—Spenser, Fairy Queen, i 1 (1590)

* * When pity (the Red Cross Knight) once forsakes the oneness of truth (Una), it is sure to get into "Wandering Wood," where it will be attacked by "Error"

Wantley (Dragon cf), a monster slain b More of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes, and, proceeding to the lair, locked the dragon in its mouth, where alone it was vulnerable—Percy, Reliques of Ancient Poetry

One of Carey's farces is entitled The Dragon of Wantley

Wapping of Denmark (The), Elsinore (3 sgt)

War-Cries At Senlac the English had two, "God Almighty!" and "Holy Cross!" The latter was probably the cry of Harold's men, and referred to Waltham Cross, which he held in special reverence

The Norman shout was "God help us!"

The Welsh war-cry was "Alleluia!"

To d startle shrieks of "Alleluia!" blended with those of "Ouli Ouli Ho!y Crome!"—Lord Lytton Harold

* * "Ouet! Ouet!" was the cry in full flight, meaning that the standards were to be defended with closed shields

The old Spanish war-cry was "St Iago! and close, Spain!"

Mount, chivalrous hidalgos; not in vain
Revive the cry "St. Iago! and close Spain!"
Byron Age of Bronze vii (1821)

* * Cervantes says the cry was "St Iago! charge, Spain!"

Mr Richey or there is a time to retreat as well as to advance The cry must always be, "St Iago! charge Spain!"—Don Quixote II i 4 (1615)

In the battle of Pharsalia, the war-cry of Pompey's army was "Herculis Invictus!" and of Cæsar's army, "Venus Victrix!"

ALASAM'S MIRROR This mirror remained unsullied when it reflected a chaste and pure-minded woman, but became dim when the woman reflected by it was faithless, wanton, or light—Arabian Nights ("Prince Zeyn Alasnam").

ANTS Alexander Ross says that the "cruel battle between the Venetians and Insubrians, and also that between the Liegeois and the Burgundians in which 30,000 men were slain, were both presignified by combats between two swarms of ants"—Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 219)

BAHMAN'S KNIFE (Prince) When prince Bahman started on his exploits, he gave his sister Parizade a knife which, he told her, would remain bright and clean so long as he was safe and well, but, immediately he was in danger or dead, would become dull or drop gout of blood—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters")

BUY TREES The withering of bay trees prognosticates a death

'Tis thought the king is dead
The bay trees in our country are all withered
Shakespeare Richard II (1597)

N B—The bay was called by the Romans "the plant of the good angel," because "neither falling sickness, neither dervill, will infest or hurt one in that place whereas a bay tree is"—Thomas Lupton, Syxt Book of Notable Things (1660)

BBE The buzzing of a bee in a room indicates that a stranger is about to pay the house a visit

BIRTHA'S EMERALD RING The duke Gondibert gave Birtha an emerald ring which, he said, would preserve its lustre so long as he remained faithful and true, but would become dull and pale if he proved false to her—Wm Davenant, Gondibert

BRAWN'S HEAD (The) A boy brought to king Arthur's court a brawn's head, over which he drew his wand thrice, and said, "There's never a traitor or a cuckold who can carve that head of brawn"—Perey, Reliques ("The Boy and the Mantle")

CANACE'S MIRROR indicated, by its lustre, if the person whom the inspector loved was true or false—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale")

CANDLES The shooting forth of a parcel of tallow called a winding-sheet, from the top of a lighted candle, gives warning to the house of an approaching death, but a bright spark upon the burning wick is the promise of a letter.

CATS on the deck of a ship are said to 'carry a gale of wind in their tail,' or to presage a coming storm. When cats are very assiduous in cleaning their ears and head, it prognosticates rain.

CATTIE give warning of an earthquake by their uneasiness.

CHILDREN PLAYING SOLDIERS on a road is said to forebode approaching war.

COALS. A cinder branding from the fire is either a purse or a coffin. Those which rattle when held to the ear are tokens of wealth, those which are mute and solid indicate sickness or death.

CORPSE CANDLES. The ynis jatuwr, called by the Welsh candyl cyrph or 'corpse candle,' prognosticates death. If small and of pale blue, it denotes the death of an infant, if large and yellow, the death of one of full age.

On a Leather cloth, made at the house of Bellar in 1699, there is a record on the 10th of May, 1699, that there were 11 corpse candles for thirteen corpse candles had been seen moving towards the churchyard. It is a fact that eleven of the men were drowned in the same storm on the 10th of May, 15.

CRADLE. It forebodes evil to the child if any one rocks it's cradle when empty.

—American Superstition

CRICKETS. Crickets in a house are a sign of good luck, but if they suddenly leave it is a warning of death.

CROW (A). A crow appearing to one on the left hand side indicates some impending evil to the person, and flying over a house foretells evil at hand to some of the inmates. (See below, "Haven.")

Corvus aliter coram pectus ab illo cornu,
Virgil, Ecl. viii 1.

CROWING OF A COCK. Themistocles was assured of his victory over Xerxes by the crowing of a cock, on his way to Artemisium the day before the battle — Herodotus, Stratagems of Jerusalem, 285.

CROWING of a hen indicates approaching disaster.

DEATH-WARNINGS IN PRIVATE FAMILIES.

1 In Germany. Several princes of Germany have their special warning-givers of death. In some it is the roaring of a lion, in others the howling of a dog. In some it is the tolling of a bell or striking of a clock at an unusual time, in others it is a bustling noise about the castle — The Living Library, 281 (1621).

2 In Berlin. A White Lady appears to some one of the household or guard, to announce the death of a prince of Hohenrollern. She was duly seen on the eve of prince Waldemar's death in 1879.

3 In Bohemia. "Spectrum tæminum vestita lugubri apparere solet in arce quidam illustris fanthæ, antequam una ex conjugibus dominorum illorum e vita decebat." — Debrno, Disquisitiones Majicae, 592.

4 In Great Britain. In Wales the corpse candle appears to warn a family of impending death. In Carmarthen scarcely any person dies but some one sees his light or candle.

In Northumberland the warning light is called the person's caaf, in Cumberland a carth, in Ross a tash, in some parts of Scotland a fyre-to-len.

King James tells us that the wrath of a person newly dead, or about to die, appears to his friends — Demonology, 125.

Edgewell Oak indicates the coming death of an inmate of Castle Drilhouse by the fall of one of its branches.

5 In Scotland. The family of Rothmurchas have the Bodachan Dun or the Ghost of the Hill.

The Kinchardines have the Spectre of the Bloody Hand.

Gartnabeg House used to be haunted by Bodach Gartn.

The house of Tulloch Gorms used to be haunted by Maug Monlach or the Girl with the Harry Left Hand.

DEATH-WATCH (The). The tapping made by a small beetle called the death-watch is said to be a warning of death.

The chambermaids christen this worm a "Death watch," because like a watch it always cries "click." Then woe be to those in the house who are sick, for sure as a gun they will give up the ghost, if the maggot cries "click" when it scratches a post.

Swift.

DIVING-ROD (The). A forked hazel rod, suspended between the balls of the thumbs, was at one time supposed to indicate the presence of water-springs and precious metals by inclining towards the earth beneath which these things might be found. Donsterswael obtained money by professing to indicate the spot of buried wealth by a diving-rod — Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary.

DOGS. The howling of a dog at night forebodes death.

A cane prævisio funere disco mori.

It. Keuchien Crepundia 113 (1662).

Capitolinus tells us that the death of Maximinus was presaged by the howling of dogs. Pausanias (in his Messenia) says the dogs brake into a fierce howl just before the overthrow of the Messenians. Finckius says the dogs in Messina flocked together and howled just before the overthrow of the Saxons in 1533 Virgil says the same thing occurred just previous to the battle of Pharsalia

Dogs give warning of death by scratching on the floor of a house

DOTTERELS

When dotterels do first appear
It shows that frost is very near
But when that dotterels do go
Then you may look for heavy snow

Salisbury Saying

DREAMS It will be remembered that Joseph, the husband of Mary, was warned by a dream to flee from Judæa, and when Herod was dead he was again warned by a dream to "turn aside into the parts of Galilee"—Matt ii 13, 19, 22

In the Old Testament, Pharaoh had a warning dream of a famine which he was enabled to provide against—Gen xli 15-36

Pharaoh's butler and baker had warning dreams, one being privised thereby of his restoration to favour, and the other warned of his execution—Gen xl 5-23

Nebuchadnezzar had an historic dream, which Daniel explained—Dan ii 1, 31-45

Abimelech king of Egypt was warned by a dream that Sarah was Abraham's wife and not his sister—Gen xx 3-16

Jacob had an historic dream on his way to Haran—Gen xxviii 12-15

Joseph, son of Jacob, had an historic dream, revealing to him his future greatness—Gen xxxvii 5-10

Daniel had an historic dream about four beasts which indicated four kingdoms (Dan vii) Whether his "visions" were also dreams is uncertain (see chs viii, x.)

It would require many pages to do justice to this subject Bland, in his Popular Antiquities, iii 134, gives "A Dictionary of Dreams" in alphabetic order, extracted from The Royal Dream-Book

DRINKING-HORNS King Arthur had a horn from which no one could drink who was either unchaste or unfaithful The cuckold's horn, brought to King Arthur's court by a mysterious boy, gave warning of infidelity, inasmuch as no one unfaithful in love or uncal to his liege lord could drink therefrom without spilling the liquor The coupe enchantée possessed a similar property

EAGLE Tarquinius Priscus was assured that he would be king of Rome, by an eagle, which stooped upon him, took off his cap, rose in the air, and let the cap fall again upon his head

Aristander assured Alexander of his victory over Darius at the battle of Arbela, by the flight of an eagle—Lloyd, Stratagems of Jerusalem, 290

EAR (The) If the left ear tangles or burns, it indicates that some one is talking evil of you, if the right ear, some one is praising you The foreboded evil may be averted by biting the little finger of the left hand

*Laudor et adverso sonat auris laudor ab ore
Dextra bono tinnit murmure lava malo
R Keuchen Crepundia 113 (1662)*

EPITAPHS (Reading) If you would preserve your memory, be warned against reading epitaphs In this instance the American superstition is the warning-giver, and not the act referred to

FIR TREES "If a fir tree be touched, withered, or burned with lightning, it is a warning to the house that the master or mistress thereof shall shortly die"—Thomas Lupton, Syzt Book of Notable Things, iii (1660)

FIRE The noise occasioned when the enclosed gas in a piece of burning coal catches fire, is a sure indication of a quarrel between the inmates of the house

FLORINEL'S GIRDLE would loosen or tear asunder if any woman unfaithful or unchaste attempted to put it on—Spenser, Fairy Queen

GATES OF GUNDOR'ORUS (The) No one carrying poison could pass these gates They were made of the horn of the horned snake, by the apostle Thomas, who built a palace of sethym wood for this Indian king, and set up the gates

GROTTO OF ERIRUS (The) contained a reed, which gave forth musical sounds when the chaste and faithful entered it, but denounced others by giving forth harsh and discordant noises—Lord Lytton, Tales of Shilcutus, iii

HARE CROSSING THE ROAD (A) It was thought by the ancient Romans that if a hare ran across the road on which a person was travelling, it was a certain omen of ill luck

Lepus quoque occursus in via. Infortunatum iter præ agil et ominosum—Alexander ab Alexandro Gentilium Dierum libri I v 13 p. 635

Nor did we meet, with nimble feet
One little fearful lepus
That certain sign as some divine,
Of fortune bad to keep us

Elisson Trip to Denmark ix.

HOOPOE (The) The country people of Sweden consider the appearance of the hoopoe as the presage of war—Pennant, Zoology, i 278

LIZARDS warn men of the approach of a serpent

LOOKING-GLASSES If a looking-glass is broken, it is a warning that some one in the house will ere long lose a friend Græce says it "betokens a mortality in the family, commonly the master"

To break a looking-glass is prophetic that the person will never get married, or, if married, will lose the person wedded

MAGPIES are prophetic birds. A common Lincolnshire proverb is, "One for sorrow, two for mirth, three for a wedding, four for death," or thus "One for sorrow, two for mirth, three a wedding, four a birth"

Angels and underworld relations have
By magpies and choughs and rooks, brought forth
The secret of man's blood

Shakespeare Macbeth (167)

Alexander Ross tells us that the battle between the British and French, in which the former were overthrown in the reign of Charles VIII, was foretold by a skarnish between magpies and jacksnaws
—Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 219)

MANTEL (The Test) A boy brought to King Arthur a court a mantle, which no one could wear who was unfaithful in love, false in domestic life, or traitorous to the king. If any such attempted to put it on, it puffed up, or hung slouch-ingly, or tumbled to pieces — *Perce,
Reliques* ("The Boy and the Mantle")

METEORS Falling stars, eclipses, comets, and other signs in the heavens,
portend the death or fall of princes

Meteors fright the fixed stars of heaven
The pale-faced moon looks bloody on the earth
Hies so fast forerun the death or fall of kings
Shakespeare Richard II act II. sc. 4 (1597)

Consult Matt xxiv 29, Luke xxi 25

MICE AND RATS If a rat or mouse, during the night, gnaw our clothes, it is indicative of some impending evil, perhaps even death

Los autem ita heret atque inconsiderat sumus ut si maiores corruerint aliquid quorum est opus hoc unum

MOON (The) When the "mone lies sair on her back, or when her horns are pointed towards the zenith, be warned in time, for foul weather is nigh at hand"
—Dr Jamieson

Foul weather may also be expected
"when the new moon appears with the old one in her arms"

Late late yestern I saw the new moons
Wi the auld moons in her arms
And I fear I fear my deir master
Tha we will come to harme

The Lall ad of Sir Patrick Spence

To see a new moon for the first time on the right hand, and direct before you, is lucky, but to see it on the left hand, or to turn round and see it behind you, is the contrary

If you first see a new moon through glass, your wish will come to pass

NAILS A white spot on the thumb promises a present, on the index finger denotes a friend, on the long finger, a foe, on the third finger, a letter or sweetheart, on the little finger, a journey to go

In America, white spots on the nails are considered lucky

NOUGHEAN'S BRACIET gave warning of poison by a tremulous motion of the stones, which increased as the poison approached nearer and nearer — Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans")

OPAL turns pale at the approach of poison

OWLS The screeching of an owl forebodes calamity, sickness, or death. On one occasion an owl strayed into the Capitol, and the Romans, to avert the evil, underwent a formal lustration

The Roman senate when within
The city walls an owl was seen
Did cause their clergy with lustrations
The round faced prodigy to avert

Butler Hudibras II. III. 797 (1665)

The death of Augustus was presaged by an owl singing [screeching] upon the top of the Curia — Xiphilinus, Abridgment of Dion Cassius.

The death of Commodus Antonius, the emperor, was foreboded by an owl sitting on the top of his chamber at Lanuvium — Julius Obsequens, Prodigies, 85

The murder of Julius Cæsar was presaged by the screeching of owls

The bird of night did sit
E'en at noonday upon the market place
Hooting and shrieking.
Shakespeare Julius Cæsar act I sc. 2 (1607)

The death of Valentinian was presaged by an owl, which perched on the top of a house where he used to bathe — Alexander Ross, Arcana Microcosmi (appendix, 218)

Antony was warned of his defeat in the battle of Actium by an owl flying into the temple of Concord — Siphilinus, Abridgment of Dion Cassius

The great plague of Würzburg, in Franconia, in 1542, was foreboded by the screeching of an owl

Alexander Ross says "About twenty years ago I did observe that, in the house where I lodged, an owl groaning in the window presaged the death of two eminent persons, who died there shortly after" — Arcana Microcosmi

PLACOCKS give warning of poison by ruffling their feathers

PERVIZ'S STRING OF PEARLS (Prince)
When prince Perviz went on his exploit, he gave his sister Parizâdâ a string of pearls, saying, "So long as these pearls move readily on the string, you may feel assured that I am alive and well, but if they stick fast, they will indicate to you that I am dead" — Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters")

PIGEONS It is considered by many a sure sign of death in a house if a white pigeon perches on the chimney

PIGS running about with straws in their mouths give warning of approaching rain

RATS forsaking a ship forebode its wreck, and forsaking a house indicate that it is on the point of falling down (See "Mice")

RAVENS The raven is said to be the most prophetic of "inspired birds" It hodes both private and public calamities "To have the foresight of a raven" is a proverbial expression

The great battle fought between Benaventum and Apieum was portended by a skirmish between ravens and kites on the same spot — Jovianus Pontanus

An irruption of the Seythians into Thrace was presaged by a skirmish between crows and ravens — Nicetas

Cicero was warned of his approaching death by some ravens fluttering about him just before he was murdered by Popilius Cænas — Maculay, History of St. Alda, 176

Alexander Ross says "Mr Draper, a young gentleman, and my intimate friend, about four or five years ago had one or two ravens, which had been quarrelling on the chimney, fly into his chamber, and he died shortly after" — Arcana Microcosmi

RUINOCEROS'S HORNS Cups made of this material will give warning of poison in a liquid by causing it to effervesce

SALT spilt towards a person indicates contention, but the evil may be averted by throwing a part of the spilt salt over the left shoulder

SHEARS AND SIEVE (The), ordeals by fire, water, etc., single combats, the cosned or cursed morsel, the Urin and Thummim, the casting of lots, were all employed as tests of innocence or guilt in olden times, under the notion that God would direct the lot aright, according to Dan vi 22

SHOES It was thought by the Romans a bad omen to put a shoe on the wrong foot

Augustus having b oversight
Put on his left shoe for his right
And like to have been slain that day
By soldiers mutin'ing for pay
Butler Hudibras

Augusto restoit immobile et consterné lorsqu'il lui arriva par mégarde de mettre le soulier droit au pied gauche. — St. Foix Essais sur Paris v 145

SHOOTING PAINS All sudden pains are warnings of evil at hand

Timeo quod rerum gesserim hic, ita dorsum totus prurit.
— Plautus Aflic Otorisus

By the pricking of my thumbs
Something evil this way comes.
Shakespeare Macbeth (1616)

SNEEZING Once a wish, twice a kiss, thrice a letter, and oftener than thrice something better

Sneezing before breakfast is a forecast that a stranger or a present is coming

Sneezing at night-time To sneeze twice for three successive nights denotes a death, a loss, or a great gain

Si dum stermutationes fiant omni nocte ab aliquo et illud continuatur per tres noctes, signo est quod aliquis vel aliqua de domo morietur vel aliud damnum domui contiget vel maximum lacrum. — Horrmannus De Miraculis Mortuorum 163

Eustathius says that sneezing to the left is unlucky, but to the right lucky Hence, when Themistocles was offering sacrifice before his engagement with Xerxes, and one of the soldiers on his right hand sneezed, Euphrantides the soothsayer declared the Greeks would surely gain the victory —Plutarch, Lives ("Themistocles")

SOOT ON BARS Flakes of sheeted soot hanging from the bars of a grate foretell the introduction of a stranger

For he is amused late I glescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars
For gloom, and foreboding some stranger's near approach

Comper Win or Feasting

SOINIA'S PICTURE, given to Mathias, turned yellow if the giver was in danger or in temptation, and black if she could not escape from the danger or if she yielded to the temptation—Massinger, The Picture (1629)

SPIDERS indicate to gold-searchers where it is to be found

STAG'S HORN is considered in Spain to give warning of an evil eye, and to be a safeguard against its malignant influences

STONE To find a perforated stone is a presage of good luck

SWALLOW'S forecast bad weather by flying low, and fine weather by flying high

TEETH WIDE APART warn a person to seek his fortune away from his native place.

THUNDER Thunder on Sunday portends the death of some learned man, judge, or author, on Monday, the death of women, on Tuesday, plenty of grain, on Wednesday, the death of harlots, or bloodshed, on Thursday, plenty of sheep, cattle, and corn, on Friday, the death of some great man, murder, or battle, on Saturday it forebodes pestilence or sickness—Leonard Digges, A Prognostication Everlasting of Right Good Effects (1556)

TOLLING BELL You will be sure of tooth-ache if you eat while a funeral bell is tolling. Be warned in time by this American superstition, or take the consequences

VEIPSEY, a spring in Yorkshire, called "prophetic," gives due warning of a death by rising to an unusual height

VENETIAN GLASS If poison is put into liquor contained in a vessel made of Venetian glass, the vessel will crack and fall to pieces

WARNING STONES Bakers in Wiltshire and in some other counties used to put a certain kind of pebble in their ovens, to give notice when the oven was hot enough for baking. When the stone turned white, the oven was fit for use

WATER OF JEALOUSY (The) This was a beverage which the Jews used to afford no adulteress could drink without bursting—The Philosophical Questions Answered (1653)

WHITE ROSE (The) A white rose gave assurance to a twin-brother of the safety or danger of his brother during his absence. So long as it flourished and remained in its pride of beauty, it indicated that all went well, but as it drooped, faded, or died, it was a warning of danger, sickness, or death—The Twin-Brothers

WITCH HAZEL A forked twig of witch hazel, made into a divining-rod, was supposed, in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, to give warning of witches, and to be efficacious in discovering them

WORMS If, on your way to a sick person, you pick up a stone and find no living thing under it, it tells you that the sick person will die, but if you find there an ant or worm, it presages the patient's recovery

Et visitans regnum lapidem inventum per viam attollat et sub lapide invenitur vermis se movens, aut formica vivens: frustum omen est, et indicium fore uteger con-sulcat: si nihil invenitur res est conclamata et certa mors.—Eucherius, Drecre orum lib. xlv.

Warren (Widow), "twice married and twice a widow" A coquette of 40, aping the airs of a girl, vain, weak, and detestable. Harry Dornton, the banker's son, is in love with her daughter, Sophia Free love, but the widow tries to win the young man for herself, by advancing money to pay off his friend's debts. When the father hears of this, he comes to the rescue, returns the money advanced, and enables the son to follow his natural inclinations by marrying the daughter instead of the designing mother

A girlish old coquette who would rob her daughter and leave her in hand a son to rot in a dungeon that she might marry this first fool she could find.—Holcroft The Food to Ruin v. 2 (1782)

Wart (Thomas), a poor, feeble, ragged creature, one of the recruits in the army of sir John Falstaff—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV, act iii. sc. 2 (1598)

Warwick (The earl of), a tragedy by Dr T. Franklin. It is the last days and death of the "king maker" (1767)

Warwick (The House of) Of this house it is said, "All the men are without fear, and all the women without stain." This brag has been made by many of our noble families, and it is about as complimentary as that paraded of queen Victoria, that she is a faithful wife, a good mother, and a virtuous woman. It is to be hoped that the same may be said of most of her subjects also.

Warwick Lane (City), the site of the house belonging to the Beauchamps, earls of Warwick

Washington of Africa (The) William Wilberforce is so called by lord Byron As Washington was the chief instrument in liberating America, so Wilberforce was the chief instigator of slave emancipation

BAXTER wrote his Saint's Everlasting Rest on a bed of sickness (1615-1691)

BLOOMFIELD composed The Farmer's Boy in the intervals of shoemaking (1766-1823)

BRAMAN (Joseph), a peasant's son, occupied his spare time when a mere boy in making musical instruments, aided by the village blacksmith. At the age of 16, he hurt his ankle while ploughing, and employed his time while confined to the house in carving and making woodwares. In another forced leisure from a severe fall, he employed his time in contriving and making useful inventions, which ultimately led him to fame and fortune (1749-1814)

BUNYAN wrote his Pilgrim's Progress while confined in Bedford jail (1628-1688)

BURRITT (Elhu) made himself acquainted with ten languages while plying his trade as a village blacksmith (Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, Danish, Persian, Turkish, and Ethiopic). His father was a village cobbler, and Elhu had only six months' education, and that at the school of his brother (1811-1879)

CAREY, the missionary and Oriental translator, learnt the rudiments of Eastern languages while employed in making and mending shoes (1761-1834)

CLEMENT (Joseph), son of a poor weaver, was brought up as a thatcher, but, by utilizing his waste moments in self-education and works of skill, raised himself to a position of great note, giving employment to thirty workmen (1779-1844).

CORBETT learnt grammar in the waste time of his service as a common soldier (1762-1835)

D'AGUESSEAU, the great French chan-celler, observing that Mde D'Aguesseau always delayed ten or twelve minutes before she came down to dinner, began and completed a learned book of three volumes (large quarto), solely during these "waste minutes." This work went through several editions (1668-1751)

ERRI utilized indefatigably every spare moment he could pick up when a journey-man printer (1787-1849)

FERGUSON taught himself astronomy while tending sheep in the service of a Scotch farmer (1710-1776)

Wat Dreary, alias Brown Will, a highwayman in captain Macheath's gang. Penchum says "he has an under-hand way of disposing of the goods he stole," and therefore he should allow him to remain a little longer "upon his good behaviour"—Gay, The Beggar's Opera, 1 (1727)

Wat's Dyke, a dyke which runs from Flintsbire to Beachley, at the mouth of the Wye. The space between Wat's Dyke and Offa's Dyke was accounted neutral ground. Here Danes and Saxons might traffic with the British without molestation The two dikes are in some places as much as three miles asunder, but in others they approach within 500 yards of each other

Archdeacon Williams says that Offa's Dyke was never a line of defence, and that it is certainly older than Offa, as five Roman roads cross it

There is a famous thine called Offa's Dyke that stretcheth far in length All kinds of wile the Danes might thither bring It was free ground, and caused the Britons strength Wat's Dyke, however, about the same was set, Between which two both Danes and Britons met in strife

Churchyard, Worthiness of Water (1771)

Water (The Dancing), a magic spring of water, which ensured perpetual youth and beauty — Comtesse D'Annoy, Fairy Tales ("Clery and Iarstar," 1682)

Water (The Yellow), a magic spring of water, which had this peculiarity If only a few drops of it were placed in a basin, no matter how large, they would fill the basin without overflowing, and form a fountain — Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters")

Water-Poet (The), John Taylor, the Thames waterman (1580-1651)

Water Standard, Cornhill This was the spot from which miles were measured It stood at the east end of the street, at the parting of four ways In 1582 Peter Morris erected there a water standard for the purpose of supplying water to Thames Street, Gracechurch Street, and Lendenhall, and also for cleansing the channels of the streets towards Bishopsgate, Aldgate, the Bridge, and Stocks' Market — Storr, Survey of London 459 (1598)

There was another water standard near Oldbourne

Any substantial building for the supply of water was called a standard, hence the Standard in Cheap, made in 1130 by John Wills, mayor, "with a small stone cistern" Our modern drinking-fountains are "standards"

Watling Street of the Sky (The), the Milky Way.

Watts (Dr Isaac) It is said that Isaac Watts, being beaten by his father for wasting his time in writing verses, exclaimed

O father pity on me take
And I will no more verses make.

Ovid, the Latin poet, is credited with a similar anecdote

Parce precor senitor poshac non versificabo

Wauch (Mansie), fictitious name of D M Moir, author of The Life of Mansie Wauch, Tailor in Dalkeith, written by himself (1828)

Waverley, the first of Scott's historical novels, published in 1814 The materials are Highland feudalism, military bravery, and description of natural scenery There is a fine vein of humour, and a union of fiction with history The chief characters are Charles Edward the Chevalier, the noble old baron of Bradwardine, the simple faithful clansman Evan Dhu, and the poor fool Davie Gellatley with his fragments of song and scattered gleams of fancy

Scott did not prefix his name to Waverley being afraid that it might compromise his poetical reputation.—Chambers, English Literature II. 556

Waverley (Captain Edward) of Waverley Honour, and hero of the novel called by his name Being gored by a stag, he resigned his commission, and proposed marriage to Flora M'Ivor, but was not accepted Fergus M'Ivor (Flora's brother) introduced him to prince Charles Edward He entered the service of the Young Chevalier, and in the battle of Preston Pans saved the life of colonel Talbot The colonel, out of gratitude, obtained the pardon of young Waverley, who then married Rose Bradwardine, and settled down quietly in Waverley Honour

Mr Richard Waverley, the captain's father, of Waverley Honour

Sir Everard Waverley, the captain's uncle

Mistress Rachel Waverley, sister of sir Everard—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.).

Wax (A lad o'), a spruce young man, like a model in wax Lucretius speaks of persona cerea, and Horace of the waxen arms of Telphus, meaning beautiful in shape and colour

A man, young lady! Lady such a man
As all the world— Why he's a man o' wax.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1595)

Way of the World (The), a comedy by W Congreve (1700) The "way of the world" is to tie up settlements to wives, to prevent their husbands squandering their wives' fortunes Thus, Hamall wanted to get into his power the fortune of his wife, whom he hated, but found it was "in trust to Edward Mirabell," and consequently could not be tampered with

Way to Keep Him (The), a comedy by A Murphy (1760) The object of this drama is to show that women, after marriage, should not wholly neglect their husbands, but should try to please them, and make home agreeable and attractive The chief persons are Mr and Mrs Lovemore Mr Lovemore has a virtuous and excellent wife, whom he esteems and loves, but, finding his home insufferably dull, he seeks amusement abroad, and those passions which have no play at home lead him to intrigue and card-playing, routes and dubious society The under-plot is this Sir Bashful Constant is a mere imitator of Mr Lovemore, and lady Constant suffers neglect from her husband and insult from his friends, because he foolishly thinks it is not comme il faut to love after he has married the woman of his choice

Ways and Means, a comedy by Colman the younger (1788) Random and Seruple meet at Calais two young ladies, Harriet and Kitty, daughters of sir David Dunder, and fall in love with them They come to Dover, and accidentally meet sir David, who invites them over to Dunder Hall, where they are introduced to the two young ladies Harriet is to be married next day, against her will, to lord Snolts, a stumpy, "gummy" nobleman of five and forty, and, to avoid this hateful match, she and her sister agree to elope at night with the two young guests It so happens that a series of blunders in the dark occur, and sir David himself becomes privy to the whole plot, but, to prevent scandal, he agrees to the two marriages, and discovers that the young men, both in family and fortune, are quite suitable to be his sons-in-law

Wayland (Launcelot) or WAYLAND SMITH, farmer in the vale of Whitehorse Afterwards disguised as the pedlar at Gummor Place—Sir W Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Wayland Wood (Norfolk), said to be the site where "the babes in the wood" were left to perish According to this tradition, "Wayland Wood" is a corruption of Wauling Wood,

Wealthcow (2 syl), wife of Hroth-gar king of Denmark.

Wealthcow went forth mindful of their race, she greeted the men in the hall. The freeborn lady first handed the cup to the prince of the Last Danes. The lady of the Helmings then went about every part she gave treasure vessels, until the opportunity occurred that she (a queen) hung round with rings. Here forth the mortal-cup to Eowulf. And thanked God that her will was accomplished, that an earl of Denmark was a guarantee against crime.—Beowulf (Anglo-Saxon of 10th century)

Wealthy (Sir William), a retired City merchant, with one son of prodigal propensities. In order to save the young man from ruin, the father pretends to be dead, disguises himself as a German baron, and, with the aid of confidants, becomes the chief creditor of the young scapegrace.

Sir George Wealthy, the son of Sir William. After having run out his money, Lucy is brought to him as a courtesan, but the young man is so moved with her manifest innocence and tale of sorrow that he places her in an asylum where her distresses would be sacred, and her indigent beauty would be guarded from temptation. Afterwards she becomes his wife.

Mr Richard Wealthy, merchant, the brother of Sir William, choleric, straightforward, and tyrannical. He thinks obedience is both law and gospel.

Lucy Wealthy, daughter of Richard. Her father wants her to marry a rich tradesman, and, as she refuses to do so, turns her out of doors. She is brought to Sir George Wealthy as a fillee d' joie, but the young man, discerning her innocence and modesty, places her in safe keeping. He ultimately finds out that she is his cousin, and the two parents rejoice in consummating a union so entirely in accordance with both their wishes.—Foots, The Minor (1760)

Weary-all Hill, above Glastonbury, to the left of Tor Hill. This spot is the traditional landing-place of Joseph of Arimathea, and here is the site (marked by a stone bearing the letters A I A D XXXI) of the holy thorn.

When the saint arrived at Glastonbury, weary with his long journey, he struck his staff into the ground, and the staff became the famous thorn the site being called "Weary-all Hill."

Web in a Millet Seed (The)
This was a web wrapped in a millet seed. It was 100 yards long, and on it were painted all sorts of birds, beasts, and fishes, fruits, trees, and plants, rocks and shells, the sun, moon, and stars, the likenesses of all the kings and queens of the earth, and many other curious devices.

The prince took out of a ruby box a walnut which he cracked and saw inside it a small hazel nut, which he cracked also and found in its a kernel of wax. He peeled the kernel and discovered a corn of wheat and in the wheat a grain of millet which contained the web.—Cornie d'Amoy Fairy Tales (The White Cat, 165-)

Wedding. The fifth anniversary is the Wooden Wedding, because on that occasion the suitable offerings to the wife are knock-knacks made of wood.

The twenty-fifth anniversary is called the Silver Wedding, because the woman on this occasion should be presented with a silver wreath.

The fiftieth anniversary is called the Golden Wedding, because the wreath or flowers presented should be made of gold. In Germany, the marriage ceremony was repeated on the fiftieth anniversary. In 1879 William, king of Prussia and emperor of Germany, celebrated his "golden wedding."

The seventy-fifth anniversary is called the Diamond Wedding, because the correct present to the wife of such a standing would be a diamond. This period is shortened into the sixtieth anniversary.

Mr T Morgan Owen, of Bronwyflla, Rhyl, says there are in Llanfynydd churchyard, near Denbigh, the two following inscriptions—

(1) John and Elin Owen, married 1679, died 1659. Announced thus

Whom one nuptial bed did contain for 80 years do here remain. Here lieth the body of Elin wife of John Owen who died the 25 day of March 1659. Here lieth the body of John Owen, who died the 23 day of August 1659.

(2) Katherine and Edward Jones, married 1638, died 1708. Announced thus

They lived amiable together in matrimony 70 years. Here lieth the body of Katherine Davies, the wife of Edward Jones, who was buried the 27 day of May 1708 aged 91 years. Here the body of Edward Jones son of John ap David Cent. lieth who was buried the 14 day of May 1709 aged 91 years.—Times July 4 1879 (weekly edition)

Wedding Day (The), a comedy by Mrs Inehbald (1790) The plot is thus Sir Adam Contest lost his first wife by shipwreck, and "twelve or fourteen years" afterwards he led to the altar a young girl of 18, to whom he was always singing the praises of his first wife—a phoenix, a paragon, the ne plus ultra of wives and women. She did everything to make him happy. She loved him, obeyed him, ah! "he would never look upon her like again." On the wedding day, this pink of wives and women made her appearance, told how she had been rescued, and sir Adam was dumfounded. "He was happy to bewail her loss," but to rejoice in her restoration was quite another matter.

Weeping Philosopher (The), Heracles, who looked at the folly of man with grief (A B C 500) (See JEDDLER)

Weir (Major), the favourite baboon of sir Robert Redgauntlet. In the tale of "Wandering Willie," sir Robert's piper went to the infernal regions to obtain the knight's receipt of rent, which had been paid, but no receipt could be found, because the monkey had carried it to the castle turret—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Weissnichtwo [Vice-neel't-vo], nowhere. The word is German for "I know not where," and was coined by Carlyle (Sartor Resartus, 1833). Sir W. Scott has a similar Scotch compound, "Kennaquhar" ("I know not where"). Cervantes has the "island of Trapoban" (i.e. of "dish-clouts," from trapos, the Spanish for "a dish-clout"). Sir Thomas More has "Utopia" (Greek, ou topos, "no place"). We might add the "island of Medūma" (Greek, "nowhere"), the "peninsula of Udamogēs" (Greek, "nowhere on earth"), the country of "Kennahtwhar," etc., and place them in the great "Nullibian" ocean ("nowhere"), in any degree beyond 180° long and 90° lat.

Wellford, one of the suitors of "the Scornful Lady" (no name is given to the lady)—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Scornful Lady (1616).

Well Three of the most prominent Bible characters met their wives for the first time by wells of water, viz, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses.

Elihu met Rebekah by a well, and arranged with Bethuel for her to become Isaac's wife—Gen. xxiv.

Jacob met Rachel by the well of Haran.—Gen. xxix.

When Moses fled from Egypt into the land of Midian, he "sat down by a well," and the seven daughters of Jethro came there to draw water, one of whom, named Zipporah, became his wife—Exod. ii 15-21.

The princess Nausicaä, daughter of Alcinoüs king of the Phæaciens, was with her maidens washing their dirty linen in a rivulet, when she first encountered Ulysses—Homer, Odyssey, vi.

Well "A well and a green vine running over it," emblem of the patriarch Joseph. In the church at Totnes is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes. On one of the shields is "a well and a green vine running over it."

Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall.—Gen. xlix 22.

Welland, a river of England, which passes by Stamford, etc., and empties itself into the Wash. Drayton speaks of an ancient prophecy which brought to this river great reverence.

That she alone should drown all Holland and should see
Her Stamford as renowned for liberal arts
As they in Cambridge are or Oxford ever were.
Polyolbion, xlii (1622)

* * The "Holland" here referred to is not the Netherlands, but a district of Lincolnshire so called (See HOLLAND, p 448).

Well-Beloved (The), Charles IV of France, Le Bien-Aimé (1368, 1380-1422).

Louis XV of France, Le Bien-Aimé (1710, 1715-1774).

Well-Founded Doctor (The), Egidius de Colonna, also called "The Most Profound Doctor" (Doctor Fundatissimus et Theologorum Princeps), sometimes surnamed "Romānus," because he was born in the Campagna di Roma, but more generally "Colonna," from a town in the Campagna (1247-1316).

Wellborn (Francis, usually called Frank), nephew of sir Giles Overreach, and son of sir John Wellborn, who "bore the whole sway" of Northamptonshire, kept a large estate, and was highly honoured. Frank squandered away the property, and got greatly into debt, but induced lady Allworth to give him her countenance, out of gratitude and respect to his father. Sir Giles fancies that the rich daughter is about to marry his nephew and, in order to bring about this double consummation, not only pays all his debts but supplies him liberally with ready money. Then, thus freed from debt, and leaving down his wild oats, young Wellborn reforms, and Lord Lovell gives him a "company."—Miltinger, A New Way to Put Old Heads (1625)

Weller (Sir H., back at the White Hart, and afterwards servant to Mr. Parwick, to whom he becomes devotedly attached. Patter than leave his master when he is sent to the Fleet, Sam Weller goes his father to arrest him for debt. His father's shrewdness, his comparisons, his raillery, and his cunning, on behalf of his master are unparalleled.

Tom Weller, father of Sam, a coachman of the old school who drives a coach between London and Dorking. Naturally portly in life he becomes far more so in his great coat of many apes. Tom wears top-boots, and his hat has a low crown and broad brim. On the stage, but he is a fine character he is a mere peevishness. He marries a widow, landlady of the Marquis of Granby, and his constant advice to his son is, "Sam, beware of the widders."—C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Wellington of Gambolors (The) Lord R. was called in Paris Le Wellington des Lauriers

Wellington's Horse, Copenhagen It died at the age of 27

Wemmick, clerk of Mr. Jaggers the lawyer. He lived at Walworth. Wemmick was a fat man, rather short in stature, with pale, wooden face. "There were some marks in the face which might have been dimples if the material had been softer." His linen is frayed, he wore four mourning rings, and a brooch representing a lady, a weeping willow, and a cinerary urn. His eyes were small and glittering, his lips small, thin, and mottled. His age was between 40 and 50 years. Mr. Wemmick wore his hat on the back of his head, and looked straight before him, as if nothing was worth looking at. Mr. Wemmick at home and Mr. Wemmick in his office were two distinct beings. At home, he was his "own engineer, his own carpenter, his own plumber, his own gardener, his own jack-of-all-trades," and had fortified his little wooden house like commodore Truncheon (q.v.). His father lived with him, and he called him "The Aged." The old man was very deaf, but heated the poker with delight to fire off the nine o'clock signal, and chuckled with joy because he could hear the bang. The house had a "real fireplace," and a plunk which crossed a ditch some four feet wide and two feet deep was the drawbridge. At nine o'clock p.m. Greenwich time the gun (called "The Stinger") was fired.

The piece of cannon was mounted in a separate frame, a variety of lattice work. It was protected from the weather by an ingenious little factory containing the carriage of an anti-aircraft gun. (See Great Py. 1881 at 127 (1881))

(This is a bad imitation of Smollett. In commo-lore Truncheon such a conceit is characteristic, but in a lawyer's clerk not so. Still, it might have passed as a good whim if it had been original.)

Wenlock (Old Wenlock), kinsman of Sir Hugo de Lacy constable of Chester. His head is cut off by the insurgents.—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II.)

Wenonah mother of Hiawatha and daughter of Nokomis. Nokomis was swimming in the moon, when some of her companions, out of jealousy, cut the rope, and she fell to earth "like a falling star." That night was born her first child, a daughter, whom she named Wenonah. In due time, this lovely daughter was wooed and won by Mudjeckewis (the west wind), and became the mother of Hiawatha. The false West Wind deceived her, and the young mother died.

Werner or Krutznor (count of Siegendorf), father of Ulric Being driven from the dominions of his father, he wandered about for twelve years as a beggar, hunted from place to place by count Strahlenheim. At length, Stra-lenheim, travelling through Silesia, was rescued from the Oder by Gabor (alias Ulric), and was lodged in an old tumbledown palace, where Werner had been lodging for some few days. Here Werner robbed the count of a rouleau of gold, and next day the count was murdered by Ulric (without the connivance or even knowledge of Werner). When Werner succeeded to the rank and wealth of count Siegendorf, he became aware that his son Ulric was the murderer, and denounced him. Ulric departed, and Werner said, "The race of Siegendorf is past."
—Byron, Werner (1821)

(This drama is borrowed from "Krutznor or The German's Tale," in Miss H Lee's Canterbury Tales, 1797-1805)

Werther, a young German student, of poetic fancy and very sensitive disposition, who falls in love with Lotte (2 syl) the betrothed and afterwards the wife of Albert. Werther becomes acquainted with Lotte's husband, who invites him to stay with him as a guest. In this visit he renews his love, which Lotte returns. So the young man mews and pules after forbidden fruit with sickly sentimentality, and at last puts an end to his life and the tale at the same time —
Goethe, Sorrows of Werther (1774)

The sort of thing to turn a young man's head, himself, and "Albert" for his friend

Kestner, who married Charlotte Buff, with whom Goethe was in love, and whom he calls "Lotte" (the heroine of the novel)

Wer'therism (th=t), spleen, megrims from morbid sentimentality, a settled melancholy and disgust of life.
The word is derived from the romance called The Sorrows of Werther, by Goethe

Cerdic, and came regularly to the succeession.)

West Indian (The), a comedy by R. Cumberland (1771). Mr Belcour, the adopted son of a wealthy Jamaica merchant, on the death of his adopted father came to London, to the house of Mr Stockwell, once the clerk of Belcour, senior. This clerk had secretly married Belcour's daughter, and when her boy was born it was "laid as a foundling at her father's door." Old Belcour brought the child up as his own son, and at death
"bequeathed to him his whole estate."
The young man then came to London as the guest of Mr Stockwell, the rich merchant, and accidentally encountered in the street Miss Louisa Dudley, with whom he fell in love. Louisa, with her father capt. un Dudley, and her brother Charles, all in the greatest poverty, were lodging with a Mr Fulmer, a small bookseller. Belcour gets introduced, and after the usual mistakes and hairbreadth escapes, makes her his wife.

Western (Squire), a jovial, fox-hunting country gentleman, supremely ignorant of book-learning, very prejudiced, selfish, irascible, and countrified, but shrewd, good-natured, and very fond of his daughter Sophia.

Philip, earl of Feinbrooke and Montgomery, was in character a squire Western: choleric, hot-tempered, illiterate, selfish, absurd, and cowardly—O borne Secret History l. 218.

Squire Western stands alone, isolated from all prototypes and in himself an inimitable picture of ignorance, prejudice, irascibility and rusticity united with natural shrewdness, constitutional good humour and an inextinguishable affection for his daughter—Pecksniff, Art. Fielding.

Whang, an avaricious Chinese miller, who, by great thrift, was pretty well off, but, one day, being told that a neighbour had found a pot of money which he had dreamt of, began to be dissatisfied with his slow gains and longed for a dream also. At length the dream came. He dreamt there was a huge pot of gold concealed under his mill, and set to work to find it. The first omen of success was a broken mug, then a house-tile, and at length, after much digging, he came to a stone so large that he could not lift it. He ran to tell his luck to his wife, and the two tugged at the stone, but as they removed it, down fell the mill in utter ruins—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, lxx (1759).

What Next? a farce by T Dibdin. Colonel Clifford meets at Brighton two cousins, Sophia and Clarissa Touchwood, and falls in love with the latter, who is the sister of major Touchwood, but thinks her Christian name is Sophia, and so is accepted by Sophia's father, who is colonel Touchwood. Now, it so happens that major Touchwood is in love with his cousin Sophia, and looks on colonel Clifford as his rival. The major tries to outwit his supposed rival, but finds they are both in error, that it is Clarissa whom the colonel wishes to marry, and that Sophia is quite free to follow the bent of her own and the major's choice.

Whims (Queen), the monarch of Whimdom, or country of whims, fancies, and literary speculations. Her subjects were alchemists, astrologers, fortune-tellers, rhymers, projectors, schoolmen, and so forth. The best way of reveling this empire is "to trust to the whirlwind and the current." When Pantagruel's ship ran aground, it was towed off by 7,000,000 drums quite easily. These drums are the vain imaginings of whimsists. Whisker, the pony of Mr Garland, Abel Cottage, Finchley

There approached towards him a little clattering jingling four-wheeled chaise drawn by a little obstinate-looking rough-coated pony and driven by a little fat, placid-faced old gentleman. Beside the little old gentleman sat a little old lady plump and placid like himself and the pony was coming along at his own pace and doing exactly as he pleased with the whole concern. If the old gentleman remonstrated by shaking, the reins the pony replied by shaking his head. It was plain that the utmost the pony would consent to do was to go in his own way after his own fashion or not at all.—C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop xiv (1840)

Whiskerandos (Don Fero'lo), the sentimental lover of Tiburina—Sheridan, Critic, ii 1 (1779)

Whist (Father of the game of), Edmond Hoyle (1672-1769)

Whistle (The). In the train of Anne of Denmark, when she went to Scotland with James VI, was a gigantic Dane of matchless drinking capacity. He had an ebony whistle which, at the beginning of a drinking bout, he would lay on the table, and whoever was last able to blow it, was to be considered the "Champion of the Whistle." In Scotland the Dane was defeated by sir Robert Laurie of Maxwellton, who, after three days' and three nights' hard drinking, left the Dane under the table, and "blew on the whistle his requiem shrill." The whistle remained in the family several years, when it was won by sir Walter Laurie, son of sir Robert, and then by Walter Riddel of Glenriddel, brother-in-law of sir Walter Laurie. The last person who carried it off was Alexander Ferguson of Crugdarroch, son of "Annie Laurie," so well known.

* Burns has a ballad on the subject, called The Whistle

Whistle. The blackbird, says Drayton, is the only bird that whistles

Upon his dulcet pipe the merle doth only play 101gobtion xiii. (1613)

Whistled. "He whistled as he went, for want of thought"—Dryden, Cymon and Iphigenia

Whistler (The), a young thief, natural son of sir G. Staunton, whom he shot after his marriage with Effie Deans—Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Whistling. Mr Townley, of Hull, says, in Notes and Queries, August 2, 1879, that a Roman Catholic checked his wife, who was whistling for a dog. "If you please, ma'am, don't whistle. Every time a woman whistles, the heart of the blessed Virgin bleeds."

Une poule qui chante le coq et une fille qui siffle portent malheur dans la maison

La poule ne doit point chanter devant le coq

A whistling woman and a crowing hen

White Birds. Some Mohammedans

believe that the spirits of the faithful (if neither prophets nor martyrs) abide under the throne of God, in the form of white birds. Martyrs are green birds, and prophets are taken to paradise direct in proper person.

White Cat (The) A certain queen, desirous of obtaining some fairy fruit, was told she might gather as much as she would if she would give to them the child about to be born. The queen agreed, and the new-born child was carried to the fairies. When of marriageable age, the fairies wanted her to marry Migonnet a fairy-dwarf, and, as she refused to do so, changed her into a white cat. Now comes the second part. An old king had three sons, and promised to resign the kingdom to that son who brought him the smallest dog. The youngest son wandered to a palace, where he saw a white cat endowed with human speech, who gave him a dog so tiny that the prince carried it in an acorn shell. The father then said he would resign his crown to that son who brought him home a web, 400 yards long, which would pass through the eye of a needle. The White Cat gave the prince a tail 100 yards long packed in the sheaf of a millet grain. The king then told his sons he would resign his throne to that son who brought home the handsomest unde. The White Cat told the prince to cut off its head and tail. On doing so, the creature resumed her human form, and was acknowledged to be the most beautiful woman on the earth.

Her eyes came first, then upon all hearts, and her sweetest kept them captive. Her shape was marvellous, her smile and modesty, her flowing hair, her manners, everything. In a word, she was beyond everything that was earthly.—Countess D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales (The White Cat, 1742)

White Horse of the Peppers, a sprat to catch a mackerel. After the battle of the Boyne, the estates of many of the Jacobites were confiscated, and given to the adherents of William III. Amongst others, the estate of the Peppers was forfeited, and the Orangeman to whom it was awarded went to take possession. "Where was it, and what was its extent?" These were all-important questions, and the Orangeman was led up and down, hither and thither, for several days, under pretence of showing them to him. He had to join the army by a certain day, but was led so far afield that he agreed to forego his claim if supplied with the means of reaching his regiment within the given time. Accordingly, the "white horse," the pride of the family, and the fastest animal in the land, was placed at his disposal, the king's grant was revoked, and the estate remained in the possession of the original owner.—S. Lover, Stories and Legends of Ireland (1832-31).

White Horse of Wantage (Berkshire), cut in the chalk hills. The horse is 87½ feet long, and may be seen at the distance of fifteen miles. It commemorates a great victory obtained by Alfred over the Danes, called the battle of Æscesdun (Ashdown), during the reign of his brother Ethelred in 871. (See RED HORSE.)

In this battle all the flower of the barbarian youth was there slain, so that neither before nor since was ever such a destruction known since the Saxons first gained Britain by their arms.—Ælfric Chronicle B. A. 871. (See also Ætzel's Life of Alfred year 871.)

White King, the title of the emperor of Muscovy, from the white robes which these kings were accustomed to use

Sunt qui principem Moscovia Album Regem nuncupant. Ego quidem causam diligenter quaerere cur regis albi nomine appellaretur cum nemo principum Moscovia eo titulo niteat [Basilius Ivanovich] ceteri usus Credo nitemur ut Persam nunc propter rubra tegumenta capitis Kissilpassa" (i.e. rubrum caput) vocant, ita reges Moscovia propter alba tegumenta Albos Reges appellari.—Sigismund.

* * Perhaps it may be explained thus Muscovy is always called "Russia Alba," as Poland is called "Black Russia"

White King So Charles I is called by Herbert. His robe of state was white instead of purple. At his funeral the snow fell so thick upon the pall that it was quite white.—Herbert, Memoirs (1764)

White Lady (The), a ghost seen in different castles and palaces belonging to the royal family of Prussia, and supposed to forebode the death of some of the royal family, especially one of the children. The last appearance was in 1879, just prior to the death of prince Waldemar. Twice she has been heard to speak, e.g. In December, 1628, she appeared in the palace at Berlin, and said in Latin, "I wait for judgment," and once at the castle of Neuhaus, in Bohemia, when she said to the princess, in German, "It is ten o'clock," and the lady addressed died in a few weeks

There are two white ladies, in fact—one the countess Agnes of Orlamunde, and the other the princess Bertha von Rosenberg, who lived in the fifteenth century. The former was buried alive in a vault in the palace. She was the mistress of a margrave of Brandenburg, by whom she had two sons. When the prince became a widower, Agnes thought he would marry her, but he made the sons an objection, and she poisoned them, for which crime she was buried alive. Another version is that she fell in love with the prince of Parma, and made away with her two daughters, who were an obstacle to her marriage, for which crime she was doomed to "walk the earth" as apparition

The princess Bertha is troubled because an annual gift, which she left to the poor, has been discontinued. She appears dressed in white, and carrying at her side a bunch of keys

It may interest those who happen to be learned in Berlin legends to know that the White Lady whose visits always precede the death of some member of the royal family was seen on the eve of prince Waldemar's death. A soldier on guard at the old castle was the witness of the apparition and in his fright fled to the guard room where he was at once arrested for deserting his post.—Brief April 4 1879

White Lady of Avenel (2 syl), a tutelary spirit—Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

White Moon (Knight of the), of Samson Carrasco. He assumed this cognizance when he went as a knight-errant to encounter don Quixote. His object was to overthrow the don in combat, and then impose on him the condition of returning home, and abandoning the profession of chivalry for twelve months. By this means he hoped to cure the don of his craze. It all happened as the barber expected the don was overthrown, and returned to his home, but soon died.—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II iv 12, etc. (1615)

White Mount in London (The), the Tower, which the Welsh bards insist was built by the Celts. Others ascribe "the Towers of Julius" to the Romans, but without doubt they are a Norman foundation

Whittle (Thomas), an old man of 63, who wants to cajole his nephew out of his lady-love, the Widow Brady, only 23 years of age. To this end he assumes the airs, the dress, the manners, and the walk of a beau. For his thick flannels, he puts on a cambric shirt, open waistcoat, and ruffles, for his Welsh wig, he wears a pigtail and chapeau bras, for his thick cork soles, he trips like a dandy in pumps. He smiles, he titters, he tries to be quite killing. He discards history and solid reading for the Amorous Repository, Cupid's Revels, Hymen's Delight, and Ovid's Art of Love. In order to get rid of him, the gay young widow assumes to be a boisterous, rollicking, extravagant, low Irishwoman, deeply in debt, and utterly reckless. Old Whittle is thoroughly alarmed, induces his nephew to take the widow off his hands, and gives him £5000 for doing so—Garrick, The Irish Widow (1757).

Who's the Dupo? Abraham Dooley, a retired slop-seller, with £80,000 or more. Being himself wholly uneducated, he is a great admirer of "learning," and resolves that his daughter Elizabeth shall marry a great scholar. Elizabeth is in love with captain Granger, but the old slop-seller has fixed his heart on a Mr Gradus, an Oxford pedant. The question is how to bring the old man round. Gradus is persuaded to change his style of dress to please the lady, and Granger is introduced as a learned pundit. The old man resolves to put together the two aspirants, and give Elizabeth to the best scholar. Gradus quotes two lines of Greek, in which the word panta occurs four times, Granger gives some three or four lines of English fustian. Gradus tells the old man that what Granger said was mere English, but Dooley, in the utmost indignation, replies, "Do you think I don't know my own mother tongue? Off with your pantry, which you call Greek! 'Tis here is the man for my money," and he gives his daughter to the captain—Mrs Cowley, Who's the Dupo?

Widow (Goldsmith's), in the Deserted Village, par 9. "All the blooming flush of life is fled" from Auburn.

All but yon widowed solitary thing,
That feebly bends beside the plashy spring
She, wretched matron forced in age for bread
To strip the brook with munting cresses spread,
To pick her wintry taggot from the thorn
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn
She only left of all the harmless train
The sad historian of the pensive plain.

Her name was Catherine GERAGHTY

Widow (The), courted by sir Hudibras, was the relief of Amminadab Wilmer or Willmot, an independent, slain at Edgemoor. She was left with a fortune of £200 a year. The knight's "Epistle to the Lady" and the "Lady's Reply," in which she declines his offer, are usually appended to the poem entitled Hudibras.

Wife (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1833). Mariana, daughter of a Swiss burgher, nursed Leonardo in a dangerous sickness—an avalanche had fallen on him, and his life was despaired of, but he recovered, and fell in love with his young and beautiful nurse. Leonardo intended to return to Mantua, but was kept a prisoner by a gang of thieves, and Mariana followed him, for she found life intolerable without him. Here count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to marry her, but Mariana refused to do so, and was arraigned before the duke (Ferrardo), who gave judgment against her. Leonardo was at the trial disguised, but, throwing off his mask, was found to be the real duke supposed to be dead. He assumed his rank, and married Mariana, but, being called to the wars, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo, being a villain, hatched up a plot against the bride of infidelity to her lord, but Leonardo would give no credit to it, and the whole scheme of villainy was fully exposed.

* * The tale of Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream hinges on a similar "law of marriage."

Wife for a Month (A), a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1624). The "wife" is Eranthe (3 syl), the chaste wife of Valerio, parted by Frederick the licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples. She repels his base advances, and, to punish her, he offers to give her to any one for one month, at the end of which time he is to die. No one will accept the offer, and the lady is restored to her husband.

Wife of Bath, one of the pilgrims to the shrine of Thomas à Becket—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388)

Wife of Bath's Tale. One of King Arthur's knights was condemned to death for ill-using a lady, but Guinevere interceded for him, and the king gave him over to her to do what she liked. The queen said she would spare his life, if, by that day twelve months, he would tell her "What is that which woman loves best?" The knight made inquiry far and near for a solution, but at length was told by an old woman, that if he would grant her a request, she would tell him the right answer to the queen's question. The knight agreed. The answer suggested was this: Women like best to have their own way and to be paramount, and the request she made was that he would marry her. This the knight at first revolted from, because she was poor, old, and ugly. The woman then asked him which he preferred, to have her as she was and a faithful wife, or to have her young and fair. He replied he would leave the decision with her. Whereupon she threw off her mask, and appeared before him young, beautiful, and rich—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388)

* * This tale is borrowed from Gower's Confessio Amantis, i, where Florent promises to marry a deformed old hag, who taught him the solution of a riddle.

Wig, the Latin pilucca, "a head of hair," through the French perruque (our perwig) In the middle of the eighteenth century, there were thirty-three different sorts of wigs in use the artichoke, bag, barrister's, bishop's, brush, bush, buckle chain, chancellor's, corded wolf's paw, count Saxe's mode, the crutch, the cut bob, the detached buckle, the drop, Dutch, full, half natural, Jansenist bob, judge's, ladder, long bob, Louis, perwig, pigeon's wing, rhinoceros, rose, scratch, she-dragon, small back, spinage seed, staircase, Welsh, and wild boar's back.

His perwig was large enough to have loaded a camel, and he bestowed upon it at least a bushel of powder — Brown Letters (Dir. Charles II.)

Wigged Prince (The Best) The guardian, uncle-in-law, and first cousin of the duke of Brunswick was called "The Best Wigged Prince in Christendom."

Wight (Isle of) So called from Wightar, great-grandson of king Cedric, who conquered the island — The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle

 Of course, this etymology is not philologically correct. Probably gwyth, "the channel" (the channel island), is the real derivation.

Wigmore Street (London) So called from Harley earl of Oxford and Mortimer, created baron Harley of Wigmore, in Herefordshire (1711)

Wild (Jonathan), a cool, calculating, heartless villain, with the voice of a Stentor. He was born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, and, like Jack Sheppard, was the son of a carpenter.

He had ten maxims: (1) Never do more mischief than is absolutely necessary for success, (2) Know no distinction, but let self-interest be the one principle of action, (3) Let not your shirt know the thoughts of your heart, (4) Never forgive an enemy, (5) Shun poverty and distress, (6) Moment jealousies in your gang, (7) A good name, like money, must be risked in speculation, (8) Counterfeit virtues are as good as real ones, for few know paste from diamonds, (9) Be your own trumpeter, and don't be afraid of blowing loud, (10) Keep hatred concealed in the heart, but wear the face of a friend.

Jonathan Wild married six wives. Being employed for a time as a detective, he brought to the gallows thirty-five highwaymen, twenty-two burglars, and ten returned convicts. He was himself executed at last at Tyburn for house-breaking (1682-1725).

Daniel Defoe has made Jonathan Wild the hero of a romance (1725). Fielding did the same in 1743. The hero in these romances is a coward, traitor, hypocrite, and tyrant, unrelieved by human feeling, and never betrayed into a kind or good action. The character is historic, but the adventures are in a measure fictitious.

Wild Boar of Ardennes, William de la Marck — Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

 The count de la Marck was third son of John count de la Marck and Aremberg. He was arrested at Utrecht, and beheaded by order of Maximilian emperor of Austria, in 1485.

Wild Boy of Hameln, a human being found in the forest of Hertsford, in Hanover. He walked on all fours, climbed trees like a monkey, fed on grass and leaves, and could never be taught to articulate a single word. He was discovered in 1725, was called "Peter the Wild Boy," and died at Broadway Farm, near Berkhamstead, in 1785.

 Madlle Jablanc was a wild girl found by the villagers of Soigny, near Chalons, in 1781. She died in Paris in 1780.

Wild-Goose Chase (The), a comedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1652). The "wild goose" is Mirabel, who is "chased" and caught by Oriana, whom he once despised.

Wild Horses (Death by) The hands and feet of the victim were fastened to two or four wild horses, and the horses, being urged forward, ran in different directions, tearing the victim limb from limb.

METTIUS SURRETIUS was fastened to two chariots, which were driven in opposite directions. This was for deserting the Roman standard (B.C. 669) — Livy, Annals, i. 28.

SALCEDE, a Spaniard, employed by Henri III. to assassinate Henri de Guise, failed in his attempt, and was torn limb from limb by four wild horses.

NICHOLAS DE SALVADO was torn to pieces by wild horses for attempting the life of William prince of Orange.

BALTHAZAR DE GERRARD was similarly punished for assassinating the same prince (1584).

JOHN CHASTEL was torn to pieces by wild horses for attempting the life of Henri IV. of France (1594).

FRANÇOIS RAYAILLAC suffered a similar death for assassinating the same prince (1610)

Wild Huntsman (The), a spectral hunter with dogs, who frequents the Black Forest to chase wild animals — Sir W Scott, Wild Huntsman (from Bürger's ballad)

* * The legend is that this huntsman was a Jew, who would not suffer Jesus to drink from a horse-trough, but pointed to some water collected in a hoof-print, and bade him go there and drink — Kuhn von Schwarz, Nordd Sagen, 499

The French story of Le Grand Veneur is laid in Fontainebleau Forest, and is supposed to refer to St Hubert — Father Mathieu

The English name is "Herne the Hunter," once a keeper in Windsor Forest — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, act iv sc 4

The Scotch poem called Albina contains a full description of the wild huntsman

Wild Wenlock, kinsman of Sir Hugo de Loe, besieged by insurgents, who cut off his head — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Wildair (Sir Harry), the hero of a comedy so called by Farquhar (1701). The same character had been introduced in the Constant Couple (1700), by the same author. Sir Harry is a gay profligate, not altogether selfish and abandoned, but very free and of easy morals. This was Wilks's and Peg Woffington's great part.

Their Wildairs Sir John Brutes, Lady Touchwoods and Mrs. Fraile are conventional reproductions of the wild gallants and demitres which figure in the licentious dramas of Dryden and Shadwell. — Sir W Scott

* * "Sir John Brute," in The Provoked Wife (Vanbrugh), "Lady Touchwood," in The Belle's Stratagem (Mrs Cowley), "Mrs Fraile," in Congreve's Love for Love

Wildblood of the Vale (Young Del), a friend of Sir Geoffrey Peveril — Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II).

Wilde (Johnny), a small farmer of Rodenkirchen, in the isle of Rügen. One day, he found a little glass slipper belonging to one of the hill-folk. Next day, a little brownie, in the character of a merchant, came to redeem it, and Johnny Wilde demanded as the price "that he should find a gold ducat in every furrow he ploughed." The bargain was concluded, but before the year was over he had worked himself to death, looking for ducats in the furrows which he ploughed — Rügen Tradition

Wildenham (Baron), father of Amelia. In his youth he seduced Agatha Friberg, whom he deserted. Agatha bore a son, Frederick, who in due time became a soldier. Coming home on furlough, he found his mother on the point of starvation, and, going to beg alms, met the baron with his gun, asked alms of him, and received a shilling. He demanded more money, and, being refused, collared the baron, but was soon seized by the keepers, and shut up in the castle dungeon. Here he was visited by the chaplain, and it came out that the baron was his father. As the baron was a widower, he married Agatha, and Frederick became his heir.

Amelia Wildenham, daughter of the baron. A proposal was made to marry her to Count Cassel, but as the count was a conceited puppy, without "brains in his head or a heart in his bosom," she would have nothing to say to him. She showed her love to Anhalt, a young clergyman, and her father gave his consent to the match — Mrs Inchbald; Lovers' Vows (altered from Kotzebue, 1800)

Wildfire (Madge), the insane daughter of old Meg Murdochson the gypsy thief. Madge had been seduced when a girl, and thus, with the murder of her infant, had turned her brain — Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Wilding (Jack), a young gentleman fresh from Oxford, who fabricates the most ridiculous tales, which he tries to pass off for facts, speaks of his adventures in America, which he has never seen, of his being entrapped into marriage with a Miss Sibthorpe, a pure invention. Accidentally meeting a Miss Grantam, he sends his man to learn her name, and is told it is Miss Godfrey, an heiress. On this blunder the "fun" of the drama hinges. When Miss Godfrey is presented to him, he does not know her, and a person rushes in who declares she is his wife, and that her maiden name was

Sithorpe It is now Wilding's turn to be dumfounded, and, wholly unable to unravel the mystery, he rushes forth, believing the world is a Bedlam let loose —S Foote, The Liar (1761)

Wilding (Sir Jasper), an ignorant but wealthy country gentleman, fond of fox-hunting. He dresses in London like a fox-hunter, and speaks with a "Hoie tally-ho!"

Young Wilding, son of sir Jasper, about to marry the daughter of old Philpot for the dot she will bring him

Maria Wilding, the lively, witty, high-spirited daughter of sir Jasper, in love with Charles Beaufort. Her father wants her to marry George Philpot, but she frightens the booby out of his wits by her knowledge of books and assumed eccentricities — Murphy, The Citizen (1757 or 1761)

Wildrake, a country squire, delighting in horses, dogs, and field sports. He was in love with "neighbour Constance," daughter of sir William Fondlove, with whom he used to romp and quarrel in childhood. He learnt to love Constance, and Constance loved the squire, but knew it not till she feared he was going to marry another. When they each discovered the state of their hearts, they agreed to become man and wife —S Knowles, The Love-Chase (1837)

Wildrake (Roger), a dissipated royalist —Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Wilemmina [BUNDLE], daughter of Bundle the gardener. Tom Tug the waterman and Robin the gardener sought her in marriage. The father preferred honest Tom Tug, but the mother liked better the sentimental and fine-phrased Robin. Wilemmina said he who first did any act to deserve her love should have it. Tom Tug, by winning the waterman's badge, carried off the bride —C Dibdin, The Waterman (1774)

Wilfer (Reginald), called by his wife R W, and by his fellow-clerks Rumty. He was clerk in the drug-house of Chicksey, Stobbles, and Vencering. In person Mr Wilfer resembled an overgrown cherub, in manner he was shy and retiring.

Mr Reginald Wilfer was a poor clerk, so poor indeed that he had never yet attained the modest object of his ambition, which was to wear a complete new suit of clothes, hat and boots included, at one time. His black hat was brown before he could afford a coat, his pantaloons were white at the seams and knees before he could buy a pair of boots, his boots had worn out before he could treat himself to new pantaloons, and by the time he worked round to the hat again, that shining modern article roofed in an ancient ruin of various periods. —Ch. IV

Mrs Wilfer, wife of Mr Reginald. A most majestic woman, tall and angular. She wore gloves, and a pocket-handkerchief tied under her chin. A patronizing, condescending woman was Mrs Wilfer, with a mighty idea of her own importance. "Viper!" "Ingrate!" and such like epithets were household words with her.

Bella Wilfer, daughter of Mr and Mrs Wilfer. A wayward, playful, affectionate, spoilt beauty, "giddy from the want of some sustaining purpose, and capricious because she was always fluttering among little things." Bella was so pretty, so womanly, and yet so childish that she was always captivating. She spoke of herself as "the lovely woman," and delighted in "doing the hair of the family." Bella Wilfer married John Harmon (John Rokesmith), the secretary of Mr Boffin "the golden dustman."

Lavinia Wilfer, youngest sister of Bella, and called "The Irrepressible." Lavinia was a tart, pert girl, but succeeded in catching George Sampson in the toils of wedlock —C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Wilford, in love with Emily, the companion of his sister Miss Wilford. This attachment coming to the knowledge of Wilford's uncle and guardian, was disapproved of by him, so he sent the young man to the Continent, and dismissed the young lady. Emily went to live with Goodman Fairlop, the woodman, and there Wilford discovered her in an archery match. The engagement was renewed, and ended in marriage —Sir II B Dudley, The Woodman (1771)

Wilford, secretary of sir Edward Mortimer, and the suitor of Barbara Rawhold (daughter of a poacher). Curious to know what weighed on his master's mind, he peeped into an iron chest in sir Edward's library, but while so engaged, sir Edward entered, and threatened to shoot him. He relented, however, and having sworn Wilford to secrecy, told him how and why he had committed murder. Wilford, unable to endure the watchful and jealous eye of his master, ran away, but sir Edward dogged him from place to place, and at length arrested him on the charge of theft. Of course, the charge broke down, Wilford was acquitted, sir Edward confessed himself a murderer, and died. (See

WILLIAMS, CALEB—G Colman, The Iron Chest (1796)

 This is a dramatic version of Goethe's novel called Caleb Williams (1794) Wilford is "Caleb Williams," and sir Edward Mortimer is "Fallkland"

Wilford, supposed to be earl of Rochdale. Three things he had a passion for "the finest hound, the finest horse, and the finest wife in the three kingdoms" It turned out that Master Walter "the hunchback" was the earl of Rochdale, and Wilford was no one—S Knowles, The Hunchback (1831)

Wilford (Lord), the truant son of lord Woodville, who fell in love with Bess, the daughter of the "blind beggar of Bethnal Green" He saw her by accident in London, lost sight of her, but resolved not to rest night or day till he found her, and, said he, "If I find her not, I'm tenant of the house the sexton builds" Bess was discovered in the Queen's Arms inn, Romford, and turned out to be his cousin—S Knowles, The Beggar of Bethnal Green (1834)

Wilfred, "the fool," one of the sons of sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone of Osbaldistone Hall—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Wilfrid, son of Oswald Wycliffe, in love with Matilda, heiress of Rolob's knight After various villainies, Oswald forced from Matilda a promise to marry Wilfrid Wilfrid thanked her for the promise, and fell dead at her feet—Sir W. Scott, Rolob (1813)

Wilfrid or Wilfrith (St) In 681 the bishop Wilfrith, who had been bishop of York, being deprived of his see, came to Sussex, and did much to civilize the people He taught them how to catch fish generally, for before they only knew how to catch eels He founded the bishopric of the South Saxons at Selsey, afterwards removed to Chichester, founded the monastery of Ripon, built several ecclesiastical edifices, and died in 709

St Wilfrid sent from York into this realm received (When the Northumbrian folk had of his see bereaved)
And on the south of Thames a seat did him afford,
By whom the people first received the saving word
Dryden. Polycrion, xl (1613)

Wilhelm Meister [Meister], the hero and title of a philosophic novel by Goethe This is considered to be the first true German novel It consists of two parts published under two titles, viz, The Apprenticeship of Wilhelm Meister

(1794-96), and The Travels of Wilhelm Meister (1821)

Wilkins (Peter), Robert Pultock of Clement's Inn, author of The Life and Adventures of Peter Willms, a Cornish Man (1750)

The tale is this Peter Wilkins is a mariner, thrown on a desert shore In time, he furnishes himself from the wreck with many necessaries, and discovers that the country is frequented by a beautiful winged race called glumms and gawreys, whose wings, when folded, serve them for dress, and when spread, are used for flight Peter marries a gawrey, by name Youwarkee, and accompanies her to Nosmndsgsut, a land of semi-darkness, where he remains many years

Peter Wilkins is a work of uncommon beauty—
Coleridge Table Talk (1832)

Wilkinson (James), servant to Mr Fairford the lawyer—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Will (Belted), William lord Howard, warden of the western marches (1563-1610)

His Bilboa blade by Marchmen felt,
Hung in a broad and studded belt
Hence in rude phrase the Borderers still Called noble Howard Belted Will.

Will Laud, a snuggler, with whom Margaret Catchpole (qv) falls in love He persuades her to escape from Ipswich jail, and supplies her with a seaman's dress The two are overtaken, and Laud is shot in attempting to prevent the recapture of Margaret—Rev R Cobbold, Margaret Catchpole

Will and Jean, a poetic story by Hector Macneill (1789) Willie Cair-lace was once the glory of the town, and he married Jeannie Miller Just about this time Maggie Howe opened a spirit shop in the village, and Willie fell to drinking Having reduced himself to beggary, he enlisted as a soldier, and Jeannie had "to beg her bread" Willie, having lost his leg in battle, was put on the Chelsea "bounty list," and Jeannie was placed, by the duchess of Buccleuch, in an almshouse Willie contrived to reach the cottage, and

Jean once more in fond affection
Chased her Willie to her breast.

Will-o'-Wisp or Will-with-a-wisp Here Will is no proper name, but a Scandinavian word equivalent to misleading or errant. Jeelnaadie villa ("a-going astray"), villr ("wandering") "I am will what to do" (i.e. "at a loss")

German, irr-wisch

Willet (John), landlord of the Maypole inn. A burly man, large-headed, with a flat face, betokening profound obstinacy and slowness of apprehension, combined with a strong reliance on his own merits. John Willet was one of the most dogged and positive fellows in existence, always sure that he was right, and that every one who differed from him was wrong. He ultimately resigned the Maypole to his son Joe, and retired to a cottage in Chigwell, with a small garden, in which Joe had a Maypole erected for the delectation of his aged father. Here at dayfall assembled his old chums, to smoke, and prose, and doze, and drink the evenings away, and here the old man played the landlord, scoring up huge debits in chalk to his heart's delight. He lived in the cottage a sleepy life for seven years, and then slept the sleep which knows no waking.

Joe Willet, son of the landlord, a broad-shouldered, strapping young fellow of 20. Being bullied and brow-beaten by his father, he ran away and enlisted for a soldier, lost his right arm in America, and was dismissed the service. He returned to England, married Dolly Varden, and became landlord of the Maypole, where he prospered and had a large family.—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841)

William, archbishop of Orange, an ecclesiastic who besought pope Urban on his knees to permit him to join the crusaders, and, having obtained permission, led 400 men to the siege of Jerusalem.—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

William, youngest son of William Rufus. He was the leader of a large army of British bowmen and Irish volunteers in the crusading army.—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, iii (1575)

* * William Rufus was never married

William, footman to Lovemore, sweet upon Muslin the lady's-maid. He is fond of cards, and is a below-stairs imitation of the high-life vices of the latter half of the eighteenth century.—A Murphv, The Way to Keep Him (1760)

William, a serving-lad at Arnheim Castle.—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

William (Lord), master of Erlingford. His elder brother, at death, committed to his charge Edmund the rightful heir, a mere child, but William cast the child into the Severn, and seized the inheritance. One anniversary, the Severn overflowed its banks, and the castle was surrounded, a boat came by, and lord William entered. The boatman thought he heard the voice of a child—nay, he felt sure he saw a child in the water, and bade lord William stretch out his hand to take it in. Lord William seized the child's hand, it was lifeless and clammy, heavy and inert. It pulled the boat under water, and lord William was drowned, but no one heard his piercing cry of agony.—R Southey, Lord William (a ballad, 1804)

William and Margaret, a ballad by Mallet. William promised marriage to Margaret, deserted her, and she died "consumed in early prime." Her ghost reproved the faithless swain, who "quaked in every limb," and, raving, bled him to Margaret's grave. There

Thrice he called on Margaret's name
And thrice he wept full sore
Then laid his cheek to her cold grave,
And word spake never more

William I king of Prussia and emperor of Germany, called Kaiser Tartuffe (1797-) (See TARTUFFE, p 977)

William king of Scotland, introduced by sir W Scott in The Talsman (1825)

William of Cloudesley (3 syl), a north country outlaw, associated with Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough (Clement of the Cliff). He lived in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough were single men, but William had a wife named Alyce, and "children three" living at Carlisle. The three outlaws went to London to ask pardon of the king, and the king, at the queen's intercession, granted it. He then took them to a field to see them shoot. William first cleft in two a hazel wand at a distance of 200 feet, after this he bound his eldest son to a stake, put an apple on his head, and, at a distance of "six score paces," cleft the apple in two without touching the boy. The king was so delighted that he made William "a gentleman of fe," made his son a royal butler, the queen took Alyce for her "chief gentlewoman," and the two companions were appointed yeomen of the bed-chamber.—Percy, Reliques ("Adam Bell," etc.), I. ii 1

William of Goldsbrough, one of the companions of Robin Hood, mentioned in Grafton's Old and Auncient Pamphlet (sixteenth century)

William of Norwich (Saint), a child said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137 (See HUGH OF LINCOLN and WERNER)

Two boys of tender age there saints ensue
Of Norwich William was, of Lincoln Hugh Whom the unbelieving Jews rebellious that abide

Dryden Polyolbion, xxiv (1622)

William-with-the-Long-Sword, the earl of Salisbury. He was the natural brother of Richard Cœur de Lion.—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Williams (Caleb), a lad in the service of Falkland. Falkland, irritated by cruelty and insult, commits a murder, which is attributed to another Williams, by accident, obtains a clue to the real facts, and Falkland, knowing it, extorts from him an oath of secrecy, and then tells him the whole story. The lad, finding life in Falkland's house insupportable from the ceaseless suspicion to which he is exposed, makes his escape, and is pursued by Falkland with relentless persecution. At last Williams is accused by Falkland of robbery, and the facts of the case being disclosed, Falkland dies of shame and a broken spirit. (See WILKINSON).—W Godwin, Caleb Williams (1794)

* * * The novel was dramatized by G Colman, under the title of The Iron Chest (1796). Caleb Williams is called "Wilford," and Falkland is "Sir Edward Mortimer."

Williams (Ned), the sweetheart of Cicely Jopson, farmer, near Clifton. Farmer Williams, Ned's father.—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Willoughby (Lord), of queen Elizabeth's court.—Sir W. Scott, Kennilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Willy, a shepherd to whom Thomalin tells the tale of his battle with Cupid (ccl iii) (See THOMALIN). In ccl viii he is introduced again, contending with Perigot for the prize of poetry, Cuddy being chosen umpire. Cuddy declares himself quite unable to decide the contest, for both deserve the prize.—Spenser, The Shepheardes Calendar (1579)

Wilmot. There are three of the name in Fatal Curiosity (1736), by George Lillo, viz., old Wilmot, his wife Agnes, and their son young Wilmot supposed to have perished at sea. The young man, however, is not drowned, but goes to India, makes his fortune, and returns, unknown to any one of his friends. He goes in disguise to his parents, and deposits with them a casket. Curiosity induces Agnes to open it, and when she sees that it contains jewels, she and her husband resolve to murder the owner, and appropriate the contents of the casket. No sooner have they committed the fatal deed than they discover it is their own son whom they have killed, whereupon the old man stabs first his wife and then himself.

The harrowing details of this tragedy are powerfully depicted, and the agonies of old Wilmot constitute one of the most appalling and affecting incidents in the drama.—R. Chambers, English Literature I, 392.

Old Wilmot's character as the needy man who had known better days, exhibits a mind naturally good, but prepared for acting evil.—Sir W Scott, The Drama

Wilmot (Miss Arabella), a clergyman's daughter, beloved by George Primrose, eldest son of the vicar of Wakefield, whom ultimately she marries.—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1766)

Winchester (The bishop of), Lancelot Andrews. The name is not given in the novel, but the date of the novel is 1620, and Dr Andrews was translated from Ely to Winchester in February, 1618-19, and died in 1626—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Wind Sold At one time, the Finlanders and Laplanders drove a profitable trade by the sale of winds. After being paid, they knitted three magical knots, and told the buyer that when he untied the first he would have a good gale, when the second, a strong wind, and when the third, a severe tempest—Olaus Magnus, History of the Goths, etc. 47 (1658)

King Eric of Sweden was quite a potentate of these elements, and could change them at pleasure by merely shifting his cap

Bessie Millic, of Pomo'na, in the Orkney Islands, helped to eke out her living (even so late as 1814) by selling favourable winds to mariners, for the small sum of sixpence per vessel

Winds were also at one time sold at mont St Michel, in Normandy, by nine druidesses, who likewise sold arrows to charm away storms. These arrows were to be shot off by a young man 25 years of age

Winds and Tides Nicholas of Lyn, an Oxford scholar and friar, was a great navigator. He "took the height of mountains with his astrolabe," and taught that there were four whirlpools like the Maelström of Norway—one in each quarter of the globe, from which the four winds issue, and which are the cause of the tides

One Nicholas of Lyn
The whirlpools of the seas did come to understand
For such immeasured pools, philosophers agree
In the four parts of the world undoubtedly there be From which they have supposed nature the winds doth raise,
And from them too proceed the flowing of the seas.

Windmill with a Weathercock Atop (The) Goodwyn, a puritan divine of St Margaret's, London, was so called (1593-1651)

Windmills Don Quixote, seeing some thirty or forty windmills, insisted that they were giants, and, running a tilt at one of them, thrust his spear into the sails, whereupon the sails raised both man and horse into the air, and shivered the knight's lance into splinters. When don Quixote was thrown to the ground, he persisted in saying that his enemy Freston had transformed the giants into windmills merely to rob him of his honour, but notwithstanding, the windmills were in reality giants in disguise. This is the first adventure of the knight—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I : 8 (1605)

Wine If it makes one stupid it is vin d'âne, if maudlin, it is vin de cerf (from the notion that deer weep), if quarrelsome, it is vin de lion, if talkative, it is vin de pie, if sick, it is vin de porc, if crafty, it is vin de renard, if rude, it is vin de singe. To these might be added, vin de chevre, when an amorous effect is produced, vin de coucou, if it makes one egotistical, and vin de crapaud, when its effect is inspiring

Wine (1814) In 1858 a sale took place in Paris of the effects of the late duchesse de Raguse, including a pipe of Madeira. This wine was fished up in 1814 from the carcass of a ship wrecked at the mouth of the Scheldt in 1778, and had lain there till 1814. Louis XVIII bought it, but part of it was presented to the French consul, and thus it came into the cellar of the duc de Raguse. At the sale, forty-four bottles were sold, and the late baron Rothschild bought them for their weight in gold

Wine (Three-Men) Very bad wine is so called, because it requires one man to hold the drinker, a second to pour the wine down his throat, and the third man is the victim himself

Abraham Santa Clara, the preaching friar, calls the wine of Alsace "three-men wine"

Wine-Mixer (The Most Famous

British), Quintañona, the go-between of Guinevere and sir Launcelot. From an old ballad, it seems that Quintañona set sir Launcelot the task of bringing to her "the bonnie white-foot deer," an animal attended by seven lions and a lioness. This deer had already been the death of many champions. It was in reality a prince who had been transformed into a deer by the incantations of his father

Winfrid (St), patron saint of virgins, beheaded by Camdoo for refusing to marry him. The tears she shed became the fountain called "St Winfrid's Well," the waters of which not only cure all sorts of diseases, but are so buoyant that nothing sinks to the bottom. St Winfrid's blood stained the gravel in the neighbourhood red, and her hair became moss. Drayton has given this legend in verse in his Polyolbion, v (1612)

Winkle (Nathaniel), M P C, a young cockney sportsman, considered by his companions to be a dead shot, a hunter, skater, etc. All these acquirements are, however, wholly imaginary. He marries Arabella Allen—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Winkle (Rip van), a Dutch colonist of New York, who met a strange man in a ravine of the Kaatskill Mountains. Rip helped the stranger to carry a leg to a wild retreat among rocks, where he saw a host of strange personages playing skittles in mysterious silence Rip took the first opportunity of tasting the keg, fell into a stupor, and slept for twenty years On waking, he found that his wife was dead and buried, his daughter married, his village remodelled, and America had become independent — Washington Irving, Sketch-Book (1820)

Peter Plindar [Dr Wolcott], Island of Innocence (1809)

Winter's Tale (The), by Shakespeare (1604) Leontês king of Sicily invites his friend Polixenês to visit him During this visit the king becomes jealous of him, and commands Camillo to poison him, but Camillo only warns Polixenês of the danger, and flees with him to Bohemia When Leontês hears thereof, his rage is unbounded, and he casts his queen Hermionê into prison, where she gives birth to a daughter, which Leontês gave direction should be placed on a desert shore to perish In the mean time, he is told that

Hermionê, the queen, is dead The vessel containing the infant daughter being storm-driven to Bohemia, the child is left there, and is brought up by a shepherd, who calls it Perdita One day, in a hunt, prince Florizel sees Perdita and falls in love with her, but Polixenês, his father, tells her that she and the shepherd shall be put to death if she encourages the foolish suit Florizel and Perdita now flee to Sicily, and being introduced to Leontês, it is soon discovered that Perdita is his lost daughter Polixenês tracks his son to Sicily, and being told of the discovery, gladly consents to the union he had before forbidden Paulina now invites the royal party to inspect a statue of Hermionê in her house, and the statue turns out to be the living queen

The plot of this drama is borrowed from the tale of Pandosto or The Triumph of Time, by Robert Greene (1583)

We should have him back

Wisdom (Honour paid to)

ANACHARSIS went from Scythia to Athens to see Solon — Ælian, De Varia Historia, v

APOLLONIOS TYANÆUS (Cappadocia) travelled through Scythia and into India

as far as the river Phison to see Hiarehins — Philostratos, Life of Apollonios, a last chapter

BRY JONSON, in 1619, travelled on foot from London to Scotland merely to see W. Drummond, the Scotch poet, whose genius he admired

LIVY went from the confines of Spain to Rome to hold converse with the learned men of that city — Pliny the Younger, Epistle, iii 2

PLATO travelled from Athens to Egypt to see the wise men or magi, and to visit Archytas of Tarentum, inventor of several automata, as the flying pigeon, and of numerous mechanical instruments, as the screw and crane

PYTHAGORAS went from Italy to Egypt to visit the vaticinators of Memphis — Porphyry, Life of Pythagoras, 9 (Kuster's edition)

SHI BA (The queen of) went from "the uttermost parts of the earth" to hear and see Solomon, whose wisdom and greatness had reached her ear Wisdom Persecuted.

ANAXAGORAS of Clazomenæ held opinions in natural science so far in advance of his age that he was accused of impiety, cast into prison, and condemned to death. It was with great difficulty that Pericles got the sentence commuted to fine and banishment

AL-FARABIS, the Arabian philosopher, was denounced as a heretic, and degraded, in the twelfth Christian century (died 1226)

BACON (Friar) was excommunicated and imprisoned for diabolical knowledge, chiefly on account of his chemical researches (1214-1294)

BRUNO (Giordano) was burnt alive for maintaining that matter is the mother of all things (1550-1600)

CROSSE (Andrew), electrician, was shunned as a profane man, because he asserted that certain minute animals of the genus Acarus had been developed by him out of inorganic elements (1781-1855)

DEE (Dr John) had his house broken into by a mob, and all his valuable library, museum, and mathematical instruments destroyed, because he was so wise that "he must have been allied with the devil" (1527-1608)

FERGIL (See "Virgilus")

GALILEO was imprisoned by the Inquisition for daring to believe that the earth moved round the sun and not the sun round the earth. In order to get his liberty, he was obliged to "abjure the heresy," but as the door closed he muttered, E pur si muove ("But it does move, though"), 1564-1642

GERBERT, who introduced algebra into Christendom, was accused of dealing in the black arts, and was shunned as a "son of Belial"

GROSTED or GROSSETESTE bishop of Lincoln, author of some two hundred works was accused of dealing in the black arts, and the pope wrote a letter to Henry III, enjoining him to disinter the bones of the too-wise bishop, as they polluted the very dust of God's acre (died 1253)

FAUST (Dr), the German philosopher, was accused of diabolism for his wisdom so far in advance of the age

PEYREFRE was imprisoned in Brussels for attempting to prove that man existed before Adam (seventeenth century)

PROTAGORAS, the philosopher, was banished from Athens, for his book On the Gods

SOCRATES was condemned to death as an atheist, because he was the wisest of men, and his wisdom was not in accordance with the age.

VIRGILIUS bishop of Salzburg was compelled by pope Zachary to retract his assertion that there are other "worlds" besides our earth, and other suns and moons besides those which belong to our system (died 784)

Geologists had the same battle to fight, and so has Colenso bishop of Natal

Wise (The)

John V duke of Brittany, "The Good and Wise" (1389, 1399-1442)

Wise Men (The Seven) (1) Solon of Athens, (2) Chilo of Sparta, (3) Thales of Miletos, (4) Bias of Priene, (5) Cleobulus of Lindos, (6) Pittakeos of Mitylene, (7) Perander of Corinth, or, according to Plato, Myrson of Chene. All flourished in the sixth century B.C.

First Solon, who made the Athenian laws; While Chilo, in Sparta, was famed for his sayings;

In Miletos did Thales astronomy teach
 Bias used in Priene his morals to preach
 Cleobulus of Lindos was handsome and wise,
 Mitylenes against thralldom saw Pittacos rise
 Periander is said to have guided thro' his court,
 The tide that Myson the Cnecian ought.

E. C. R.

One of Plutarch's brochures in the Moralia is entitled, "The Banquet of the Seven Wise Men," in which Periander is made to give an account of a contest at Chaleis between Homer and Hesiod. The latter won the prize, and caused this inscription to be engraved on the tripod presented to him:

This Hesiod won to the Heliconian nine
 In Chaleis won from Homer the divine.

Wise Men of the East Klopstock, in The Messiah, v, says there were six "Wise Men of the East," who, guided by the star, brought their gifts to Jesus, "the heavenly babe," viz, Ha'dad, Sel'ima, Zimri, Mirja, Be'led, and Sun'ith (See COLOGNE, THREE KINGS OF)

Wisest Man So the Delphic oracle pronounced Socrates to be. Socrates modestly made answer, 'Twas because he alone had learnt this first element of truth, that he knew nothing.

Not those seven sages might him parallel
 Nor he whom Pythian maid did willome tell
 To be the wisest man that then on earth did dwell
 Plain Fletcher The Purple Island vi. (1633)

Wisheart (The Rev Dr), chaplain to the earl of Montrose—Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Wishfort (Lady), widow of sir Jonathan Wishfort, an irritable, impatient, decayed beauty, who painted and enamelled her face to make herself look blooming, and was afraid to frown lest the enamel might crack. She pretended to be coy, and assumed, at the age of 60, the airs of a girl of 16. A trick was played upon her by Edward Mirabell, who induced his lackey Waitwell to personate sir Rowland, and make love to her, but the deceit was discovered before much mischief was done. Her pet expression was, "As I'm a person"—W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Wishing-Cap (The), a cap given to Fortunatus. He had only to put the cap on and wish, and whatever he wished he instantly obtained—Straparola, Fortunatus

Wishing-Rod (The), a rod of pure gold, belonging to the Nibelungs. Whoever possessed it could have anything he desired to have, and hold the whole world in subjection—The Nibelungen Lied, 1160 (1210)

Wishing-Sack (The), a sack given by our Lord to a man named "Fourteen," because he was as strong as fourteen men. Whatever he wished to have he had only to say, "Artchila murtchula!" ("Come into my sack"), and it came in, or "Artchila murtchula!" ("Go into my sack"), and it went in.

* * This is a Basque legend. In Gascoigne it is called "Ramee's Sack" (Le Sac de la Ramée). "Fourteen" is sometimes called "Twenty-four," sometimes a Tartaro or Polypheme. He is very similar to Christoph'eros.

Wisp of Straw, given to a scold as a rebuke.

A wisp of straw were worth a thousand crowns,
 To make this shameless callet know herself
 Shakespeare 3 Henry 1 act II sc. 2 (1595).

Wit—Simplicity It was said of John Gay that he was

In wit a man simplicity a child.

* * The lino is often slung at Oliver Goldsmith, to whom, indeed, it equally applies.

Witch. The last person prosecuted before the lords of justiciary (in Scotland) for witchcraft was Elspeth Rule. She was tried May 3, 1709, before lord Anstruther, and condemned to be burned on the cheek, and banished from Scotland for life—Arnot, History of Edinburgh, 366, 367.

Witch-Finder, Matthew Hopkins (seventeenth century). In 1645 he hanged sixty witches in his own county (Essex) alone, and received 20s a head for every witch he could discover.

Has not the present parliament
 Mat Hopkins to the devil sent Fully empowered to treat about,
 Finding revolted witches out?
 And has not he within a year
 Hanged three score of them in one shire?
 S Butler Zuiderbra II. 3 (1634)

Witch of Atlas, the title and heroine of one of Shelley's poems.

Witch of Balwer'y, Margaret Aiken, a Scotchwoman (sixteenth century)

Witch of Edmonton (The), called "Mother Sawyer." This is the true traditional witch, no mystic hag, no weird sister, but only a poor, deformed old woman, the terror of villagers, and amenable to justice.

Why should the envious world
 Throw all their scandalous malice upon me?

Because I'm poor deformed and ignorant
And like a bow buckled and bent together
By some more strong in mischief than myself
The Witch of Edmonton (by Rowley Dekker and Ford 1658)

Witch's Blood. Whoever was successful in drawing blood from a witch, was free from her malignant power. Hence Talbot, when he sees La Pucelle, exclaims, "Blood will I draw from thee, thou art a witch!"—Shakespeare, 1 Henry VI act 1 sc 5 (1592)

Witherington (General) alias Richard Tresham, who first appears as Mr Matthew Middlemas

Mrs Witherington, wife of the general, alias Mrs Middlemas (born Zelia de Monçada). She appears first as Mrs Middlemas—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Wititterly (Mr Henry), an important gentleman, 38 years of age, of rather plebeian countenance, and with very light hair. He boasts everlastingly of his grand friends. To shake hands with a lord was a thing to talk of, but to entertain one was the seventh heaven to his heart.

Mrs Wititterly [Julia], wife of Mr Wititterly, of Cadogan Place, Sloane Street, London, a faded lady living in a faded house. She calls her page Alphonse (2 syl), "although he has the face and figure of Bill." Mrs Wititterly toadies the aristocracy, and, like her husband, boasts of her grand connections and friends—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838) (See TITNUS, p 1001)

Witi'za (See VITIZA)

Witling of Terror, Bertrand Barère, also called "The Anacreon of the Guillotine" (1745-1841)

Wits "Great wits to madness nearly are allied"—Pope

* * * The idea is found in Seneca Nul-lum magnum ingenium absque mixtura dementiæ est. Festus said to Paul, "Much learning doth make thee mad" (Acts xxvi 24)

Wits (Your five). Stephen Hawes explains this expression in his poem of Grande Amoure, xxiv, from which we gather that the five wits are Common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, and memory (1515)

Alas, sir how fell you besides your five wits?
Shakespeare Twelfth Night act iv sc 2 (1602)

Wittenbold, a Dutch commandant, in the service of Charles II—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Wittol (Sir Joseph), an ignorant, foolish simpleton, who says that Bully Buff "is as brave a fellow as Cannibal"—Congreve, The Old Bachelor (1698)

Witwould (Sir Wilful), of Shropshire, half-brother of Anthony Witwould, and nephew of lady Wishfort. A mixture of bashfulness and obstinacy, but when in his cups as loving as the monster in the Tempest. He is "a superannuated old bachelor," who is willing to marry Millamant, but as the young lady prefers Edward Mirabell, he is equally willing to resign her to him. His favourite phrase is, "Wilful will do it"

Anthony Witwould, half-brother to sir Wilful. "He has good nature and does not want wit." Having a good memory, he has a store of other folks' wit, which he brings out in conversation with good effect—W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are, a comedy by Mrs Inchbald (1797). Lady Priory is the type of the former, and Miss Dorrillon of the latter. Lady Priory is discreet, domestic, and submissive to her husband, but Miss Dorrillon is gay, flighty, and fond of pleasure. Lady Priory, under false pretences, is allured from home by a Mr Bronzely, a man of no principle and a rake, but her quiet, innocent conduct quite disarms him, and he takes her back to her husband, ashamed of himself, and resolves to amend. Miss Dorrillon is so involved in debt that she is arrested, but her father from the Indies pays her debts. She also repents, and becomes the wife of sir George Evelyn

Wives of Literary Men. The following were unhappy in their wives—Addison, Byron, Dickens, Dryden, Durer Haydn, Hooker, Ben Jonson, W Lilly (second wife), Milton, Molière, More, Sadi the Persian poet, Scaliger, Shakespeare, Shelley, Socrâtes, Wicherly, etc. The following were happy in their choice—Thomas Moore, sir W Scott, Wordsworth, etc. The reader can add to the list, which will serve as a heading

Wizard of the North, sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Wobbler (Mr), of the Circumlocution Office. When Mr Clennam, by the direction of Mr Barnacle, in another department of the office, called on this gentleman, he was telling a brother clerk about a rat-hunt, and kept Clennam waiting a considerable time. When at length Mr Wobbler chose to attend, he politely said, "Hallo, there! What's the matter?" Mr Clennam briefly stated his question, and Mr Wobbler replied, "Can't inform you. Never heard of it. Nothing at all to do with it. Try Mr Clive." When Clennam left, Mr Wobbler called out, "Mister! Hallo, there! Shnt the door after you. There's a devil of a draught!"—Charles Dickens, Little Dorrit, x (1857)

Woeful Countenance (Knight of the) Don Quixote was so called by Sancho Panza, but after his adventure with the lions he called himself "The Knight of the Lions"—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I in 5, II 1 17 (1605-15)

Wolf The NEURI, according to Herodotus, had the power of assuming the shape of wolves once a year—iv 105

One of the family of ANIÆUS, according to Pliny, was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years

LYCAON, king of Arcadia, was turned into a wolf because he attempted to test the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a "hash of human flesh"—Ovid

VERETICUS, king of Wales, was converted by St. Patrick into a wolf

Wolf (A), emblem of the tribe of Benjamin

Benjamin shall ravine as a wolf. In the morning he shall devour the prey and at night he shall divide the spoil.—Gen. xlix 27

Wolf The last wolf in Scotland was killed in 1680, by Cameron of Lochiel [Lok keel]

The last wolf in Ireland was killed in Cork, 1710

Wolf Tho she-wolf is made by Dante to symbolize avarice. When the poet began the ascent of fame, he was first met by a panther (pleasure), then by a lion (ambition), then by a she-wolf, which tried to stop his further progress

A she-wolf	who in her leanness seemed
Fall of all wants,	with such fear
O overwhelmed me	that of the height all hope I lost.
	Dante Inferno I (1300)

Wolf (To cry), to give a false alarm
YOW-WANG, emperor of China, was greatly enamoured of a courtesan named Pao-tse, whom he tried by sundry expedients to make laugh. At length he hit upon the following plan—He caused the tocsins to be rung, the drums to be beaten, and the signal-fires to be lighted, as if some invader was at the gates. Pao-tse was delighted, and laughed immoderately to see the vassals and feudatory princes pouring into the city, and all the people in consternation. The emperor, pleased with the success of his trick, amused his favourite over and over again by repeating it. At length an enemy really did come, but when the alarm was given, no one heeded it, and the emperor was slain (B.C. 770)

Wolf duke of Gascony, one of Charlemagne's paladins. He was the originator of the plan of tying wetted ropes round the temples of his prisoners to make their eye balls start from their sockets. It was he also who had men sewn up in freshly stripped bulls' hides, and exposed to the sun till the hides, in shrinking, crushed their bones—L'Epine, Croquemitaine, iii

Wolf of France (She), Isabella la Belle, wife of Edward II. She murdered her royal husband "by tearing out his bowels with her own hands"

She-wolf of France,
That tear at the bow!

Wolf's Head. An outlaw was said to carry on his shoulders a "wolf's head," because he was hunted down like a wolf, and to kill him was deemed as meritorious as killing a wolf

Item foris facit, omnia quo dactis sunt, quia a tempore quo utlagatus est CAPUT GERIT LUPINUM ita ut impune ab omnibus interfici possit.—Bracton II 35

Wolves The Greeks used to say that "wolves bring forth their young only twelve days in the year." These are the twelve days occupied in conveying Leto from the Hyperboreans to Delos—Aristotle, Hist. Animal, vii 35

 J. Tobin, The Boreyrior, II 1 (1854)

Woman changed to a Man
 Iphis, daughter of Lygdus and Telethusa of Crete. The story is that the father gave orders if the child about to be born proved to be a girl, it was to be put to death, and that the mother, unwilling to lose her infant, brought it up as a boy. In due time, the father betrothed his child to Ianthe, and the mother, in terror, prayed for help, when Isis, on the day of marriage, changed Iphis to a man—Ovid, Metaph, ix 12, xiv 699

CENEUS [S. nuce] was born of the female sex, but Neptune changed her into a man. Antas, however, found her in the infernal regions restored to her original sex.

THE L'ASIAS was converted into a woman for killing a female snake in copulation, and was restored to his original sex by killing a male snake in the same act.

D'EON DE BEAUMONT was an epicene creature whose sex was unknown during life. After death (1810) he was found to be male.

HELMAPHRODITOS was of both sexes.

Woman killed with Kindness
 (A), a tragedy by Thos Heywood (1600). The "woman" was Mrs Frankford, who was unfaithful to her marriage vow. Her husband sent her to live on one of his estates, and made her a liberal allowance, she died, but on her death-bed her husband came to see her, and forgave her.

Woman made of Flowers
 Gwydion son of Don "formed a woman out of flowers," according to the bard Taliesin. Arianrod had said that Llew Llaw Giffes (i.e. "The Lion with the Steady Hand") should never have a wife of the human race. So Math and Gwydion, two enchanters,

Took blossoms of oak and blossoms of broom and blossoms of meadow sweet, and produced therefrom a maiden the fairest and most graceful ever seen and baptized her Blodeuwedd and she became his bride.—The Mabinogion ("Math" c.c., twelfth century)

Woman reconciled to her Sex.
 Lady Wortley Montague said, "It goes far to reconcile me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of ever marrying one."

Woman that deliberates (The)

The woman that deliberates is lost.
 Addison Cato iv 1 (1713).

Woman's Wit or Love's Disgraces, a drama by S Knowles (1838)

Hero Sathon loved sir Valentine de Grey, but offended him by waltzing with lord Athunree. To win him back, she assumed the disguise of a quakeress, called herself Ruth, and pretended to be Hero's cousin. Sir Valentine fell in love with Ruth, and then found out that Ruth and Hero were one and the same person. The contemporaneous plot is that of Helen and Walsingham, lovers. Walsingham thought Helen had played the wanton with lord Athunree, and he abandoned her. Whereupon Helen assumed the garb of a young man named Eustace, became friends with Walsingham, said she was Helen's brother, but in the brother he discovered Helen herself, and learnt that he was wholly mistaken by appearances.

Wonder (The), a comedy by Mrs Centlivre, the second title being A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714). The woman referred to is Violanté, and the secret she keeps is that donna Isabella, the sister of don Felix, has taken refuge under her roof. The danger she undergoes in keeping the secret is this: Her lover, Felix, who knows that colonel Briton calls at the house, is jealous, and fancies that he calls to see Violanté. The reason why donna Isabella has sought refuge with Violanté is to escape a marriage with a Dutch gentleman whom she dislikes. After a great deal of trouble and distress, the secret is unravelled, and the comedy ends with a double marriage, that of Violanté with don Felix, and that of Isabella with colonel Briton.

Wonderful Doctor, Roger Bacon (1214-1292)

Wood (Babes in the), a baby boy and girl left by a gentleman of Norfolk on his death-bed to the care of his brother. The boy was to have £300 a year on coming of age, and little Jane £500 as a wedding portion. The uncle promised to take care of the children, but scarcely had a year gone by when he hired two ruffians to make away with them. The hirelings took the children on horseback to Wayland Wood, where they were left to die of cold and hunger. The children would have been killed, but one of the fellows relented, expostulated with his companion, and finally slew him. The survivor compromised with his conscience by leaving the babes alive in the wood. Everything went ill with the uncle from that hour: his children died, his cattle died, his barns were set on fire, and he himself died in jail.

* * The prettiest version of this story is one set to a Welsh tune, but Percy has a version in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry.

Wood (The Maria), a civic pleasure-barge, once the property of the lord majors. It was built in 1816 by Sir Matthew Wood, and was called after his eldest daughter. In 1859 it was sold to alderman Humphrey for £410.

Wood Street (London) is so called from Thomas Wood, sheriff, in 1491, who dwelt there.

Wood'cock (Adam), falconer of the lady Mary at Arenel Castle. In the revels he takes the character of the "abbot of Unreason"—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Woodcock (Justice), a gouty, rheumatic, crusty, old country gentleman, who invariably differed with his sister Deb'orah in everything. He was a bit of a Lothario in his young days, and still retained a somewhat lecherous tooth. Justice Woodcock had one child, named Lucinda, a merry girl, full of frolic and fun.

Deborah Woodcock, sister of the justice, a starchy, prudish old maid, who kept the house of her brother, and disagreed with him in everything—Isaac Bickerstaff, Love in a Village (1762).

Woodcocks live on Suction. These birds feed chiefly by night, and, like ducks, seem to live on suction, but in reality they feed on the worms, snails, slugs, and the little animals which swarm in muddy water.

One cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction.
Byron Don Juan, ll. 67 (1819).

Wooden Horse (The) Virgil tells us that Ulysses had a monster wooden horse made by Iphias after the death of Hector, and gave out that it was an offering to the gods to secure a prosperous voyage back to Greece. At the advice of Sinon, the Trojans dragged the horse into Troy for a palladium, but at night the Grecian soldiers concealed therein were released by Sinon from their concealment, slew the Trojan guards, opened the city gates, and set fire to Troy. Ar-rations of Ulysses, in his poem called The Description of Troy, furnished Virgil with the tale of "the Wooden Horse" and "the burning of Troy" (H n c 776)

A remarkable parallel occurred in Sar-acene history. Arrican, in Syria, was taken in the seventh century by Abu Obaidah by a similar stratagem. He obtained leave of the governor to deposit in the citadel some old lumber which impeded his march. Twenty large boxes filled with men were carried into the castle. Abu marched off, and while the Christians were returning thanks for the departure of the enemy, the soldiers removed the sliding bottoms of the boxes and made their way out, overpowered the sentries, surprised the great church, opened the city gates, and Abu, entering with his army, took the city without further opposition.—Oakes, History of the Saracens, v. 185 (1718)

The capture of Sark affords another parallel. Sark was in the hands of the French. A Netherlander, with one ship, asked permission to bury one of his crew in the chapel. The French consented, provided the crew came on shore wholly unarmed. This was agreed to, but the coffin was full of arms, and the crew soon equipped themselves, overpowered the French, and took the island.—Percy,
Anecdotes, 219

Sark with late and fire, with hope unwieldy force
Came clattering like the Greeks out of the wooden horse.
Dryden, Polydoron L 1 (1613)

Wooden Horse (The), Clavileno, the wooden horse on which don Quixote and Sancho Panza got astride to disenchanted Antonmaria and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of queen Maguncia of Candaya—Cervantes, Don Quixote,

II in 1, 5 (1615)

Another wooden horse was the one given by an Indian to the shah of Persia as a New Year's gift. It had two pegs, by turning one, it rose into the air, and by turning the other, it descended wherever the rider wished. Prince Firouz mounted the horse, and it carried him instantaneously to Bengal.—Arabian Nights
("The Enchanted Horse")

Reynard says that king Grimpart made for the daughter of king Mercadig's a wooden horse which would go a hundred miles an hour. His son Clamad's mounted it, and it flew out of the window of the king's hall, to the terror of the young prince.—Alkman, Reynard the Fox (1198)

Wooden Spoon The last of the honour men in the mathematical tripos at the examination for degrees in the University of Cambridge.—See Dictionary of Phrases and Fables

Rare my invention must be down at zero
And grow one or many "wooden spoons"
Of verse (the name which we Cantabrigians
To dub the last of honours) degrees!
1890, Don Juan, III, 110 (1890)

Wooden Sword (He wears a) Said of a person who rejects an offer at the early part of the day, and sells the article at a lower price later on. A euphemism for a fool, the fools or jesters were furnished with wooden swords.

Wooden Walls, ships made of wood. When Xerxes invaded Greece, the Greeks sent to ask the Delphic oracle for advice, and received the following answer (H c 150) —

Falls his Argos, and Zeus, the sire of all,
His safety is allied in a wooden wall
By time and harvest, shores shall weeping tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell.

Wooden Wedding, the fifth anniversary of a wedding. It used, in Germany, to be etiquette to present gifts made of wood to the lady on this occasion. The custom is not wholly abandoned even now.

Woodman (The), an opera by sir
H Bate Dudley (1771). Emily was the companion of Miss Wilford, and made with Miss Wilford's brother "a mutual vow of inviolable affection," but Wil-ford's uncle and guardian, greatly disapproving of such an alliance, sent the young man to the Continent, and dismissed the young lady from his service.
Emily went to live with Goodman Fair-lop, the woodman, and there Wilford discovered her in an archery match. The engagement was renewed, and terminated in marriage. The woodman's daughter Dolly married Matthew Medley, the factotum of sir Walter Waring.

Woodstal (Henry), in the guard of Richard Cœur de Lion—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Woodstock, a novel by Sir W. Scott (1826). It was hastily put together, but is not unworthy of the name it bears.

Woodville (Harry), the treacherous friend of Penruddock, who ousted him of the wife to whom he was betrothed. He was wealthy, but reduced himself to destitution by gambling.

Mrs Woodville (whose Christian name was Arabella), wife of Harry Woodville, but previously betrothed to Roderick Penruddock. When reduced to destitution, Penruddock restored to her the settlement which her husband had lost in play.

Captain Henry Woodville, son of the above, a noble soldier, brave and high-minded, in love with Emily Tempest, but, in the ruined condition of the family, unable to marry her. Penruddock makes over to him all the deeds, bonds, and obligations which his father had lost in gambling—Cumberland, The Wheel of Fortune (1779).

Woodville (Lord), a friend of general Brown. It was Lord Woodville's house that was haunted by the "lady in the Saeque"—Sir W. Scott, The Tapestered Chamber (time, George III.)

Woollen. It was Mrs Oldfield, the actress, who revolted at the idea of being shrouded in woollen. She insisted on being arrayed in clintz trimmed with Brussels lace, and on being well rouged to hide the pallor of death. Pope calls her "Narcissa."

Ollous! In woollen? 'Twould a saint provoke! "

Were the best words that poor Narcissa spoke.

No! let a charming clintz and Brussels lace

Wrap my cold limbs and shade my lifeless face.

One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead!

And Betty give this cheek a little red."

Pope Moral Essays I. (1731)

Wopsle (Mr), parish clerk. He had a Roman nose, a large, shining, bald forehead, and a deep voice, of which he was very proud. "If the Church had been thrown open," i.e. free to competition, Mr Wopsle would have chosen the pulpit. As it was, he only punished the "Amen's" and gave out the psalms, but his face always indicated the inward thought of

"Look at this and look at that," meaning the gent in the reading-desk. He turned actor in a small metropolitan theatre—C. Dickens, Great Expectations (1860).

Work (Endless), Penelopë's web (p. 747), Vortigern's Tower (p. 1075), washing the blackamoor white, etc.

World (The End of the). This ought to have occurred, according to cardinal Nicolas de Cusa, in 1704. He demonstrates it thus. The Deluge happened in the thirty-fourth jubilee of fifty years from the Creation (A.M. 1700), and therefore the end of the world should properly occur on the thirty-fourth jubilee of the Christian era, or A.D. 1704. The four grace years are added to compensate for the blunder of chronologists respecting the first year of grace.

The most popular dates of modern times for the end of the world, or what is practically the same thing, the Millennium, are the following—1757, Swedenborg, 1836, Johann Albrecht Bengel, Erklärte Offenbarung, 1843, William Miller, of America, 1866, Dr John Cumming, 1881, Mother Shipton.

It was very generally believed in France, Germany, etc., that the end of the world would happen in the thousandth year after Christ, and therefore much of the land was left uncultivated, and a general famine ensued. Luckily, it was not agreed whether the thousand years should date from the birth or the death of Christ, or the desolation would have been much greater. Many charters begin with these words, As the world is now drawing to its close. Kings and nobles gave up their state. Robert of Franco, son of Hugh Capet, entered the monastery of St Denis, and at Limoges, princes, nobles, and knights proclaimed "God's Truce," and solemnly bound themselves to abstain from feuds, to keep the peace towards each other, and to help the oppressed—Hallam, The Middle Ages (1818).

Another hypothesis is this. As one day with God equals a thousand years (Psalms xc. 4), and God laboured in creation six days, therefore the world is to labour 6000 years, and then to rest. According to this theory, the end of the world ought to occur A.M. 6000, or A.D. 1996 (supposing the world to have been created 4004 years before the birth of Christ). This hypothesis, which is widely accepted, is quite safe for another century at least.

World without a Sun

And say without our hopes, without our fears,
Without the home that plighted love endears,
Without the smile from partial beauty won
Oh! what were man?—a world without a sun
Campbell, Pleasures of Hope II (1799)

Worldly Wiseman (Mr), one who tries to persuade Christian that it is every bad policy to continue his journey towards the Celestial City—Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, I (1678)

Worm (Man is a)

The learn d themselves we Book worms name,
The blockhead is a Slow worm
Thy nymph whose tail is all on flame
Is aptly termed a Glow worm,
The flatterer an Earwig grows
Thus worms suit all conditions —
Misers are Muck worms, Silk worms beaus,
And Death watches physicians
Pope To Mr John Moore (1733)

Worms (Language of) Melampus the prophet was acquainted with the language of worms, and when thrown into a dungeon, heard the worms communicating to each other that the roof overhead would fall in, for the beams were eaten through. He imparted this intelligence to his jailers, and was removed to another dungeon. At night the roof did fall, and the king, amazed at this foreknowledge, released Melampus, and gave him the oven of Iphiklos.

Worse than a Crime Talleyrand said of the murder of the duc d'Enghien by Napoleon I, "It was worse than a crime, it was a blunder."

Worthies (The Nine) Three Gentiles Hector, Alexander, Julius Caesar, three Jews Joshua, David, Judas Macabreus, three Christians Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon.

Worthies of London (The Nine)

1 SIR WILLIAM WALWORTH, fishmonger, who stabbed Wat Tyler the rebel. For this service King Richard II gave him the "cap of maintenance" and a "dagger" for the arms of London (lord mayor 1374, 1380).

2 SIR HENRY PRITCHARD OF PICARD, vintner, who feasted Edward III, the Black Prince, John king of Austria, the king of Cyprus, and David of Scotland, with 5000 guests, in 1356, the year of his mayoralty.

3 SIR WILLIAM SEVENOKE, grocer. "A foundling, found under seven oaks." He fought with the dauphin, and built twenty almshouses, etc. (lord mayor 1418).

4 SIR THOMAS WHITE, merchant tailor, who, during his mayoralty in 1553, kept London faithful to queen Mary during Wyatt's rebellion. Sir Thomas White was the son of a poor clothier, and began trade as a tailor with £100. He was the founder of St John's College, Oxford, on the spot where two elms grew from one root.

5 SIR JOHN BOWHAM, mereer, commander of the army which overcame Solyman the Great, who knighted him on the field after the victory, and gave him chains of gold, etc.

6 SIR CHRISTOPHER CROKER, vintner, the first to enter Bordeaux when it was besieged. Companion of the Black Prince. He married Doll Stodie.

7 SIR JOHN HAWKWOOD, tailor, knighted by the Black Prince. He is immortalized in Italian history as Giovanni Acuti Cavahero. He died in Padua.

8 SIR HUGH CAVERLEY, silk-weaver, famous for ridding Poland of a monstrous bear. He died in France.

9 SIR HENRY MAIEVERER, grocer, generally called "Henry of Cornhill," a crusader in the reign of Henry IV, and guardian of "Jacob's Well"—R Johnson, The Nine Worthies of London (1592).

Worthington (Lieutenant), "the poor gentleman," a disabled officer and a widower, very poor, "but more proud than poor, and more honest than proud." He was for thirty years in the king's army, but was discharged on half-pay, being disabled at Gibraltar by a shell which crushed his arm. His wife was shot in his arms when his daughter was but three years old. The lieutenant put his name to a bill for £500, but his friend dying before he had effected his insurance, Worthington became responsible for the entire sum, and if Sir Robert Bramble had not most generously paid the bill, the poor lieutenant would have been thrown into jail.

Emily Worthington, the lieutenant's daughter, a lovely, artless, affectionate girl, with sympathy for every one, and a most amiable disposition. Sir Charles Cropland tried to buy her, but she rejected his proposals with scorn, and fell in love with Frederick Bramble, to whom she was given in marriage—G Colman, The Poor Gentleman (1802).

Worthy, in love with Melinda, who coquets with him for twelve months, and then marries him—G Farquhar, The Recruiting Officer (1705).

Worthy (Lord), the suitor of lady Reveller, who was fond of play. She became weary of gambling, and was united in marriage to lord Worthy—Mrs Centlivre, The Basset Table (1706)

Wouvermans (The English), Abraham Cooper One of his best pieces is "The Battle of Bosworth Field"

Richard Cooper is called "The British Poussin"

Wrangle (Mr Caleb), a hen-pecked young husband, of oily tongue and plausible manners, but smarting under the nagging tongue and wilful ways of his fashionable wife

Mrs Wrangle, his wife, the daughter of sir Miles Mowbray She was for ever snubbing her young husband, wrangling with him, morning, noon, and night, and telling him most provokingly "to keep his temper" This couple lead a cat-and-dog life he was sullen, she quick-tempered, he jealous, she open and incautious—Cumberland, First Love (1796)

Wrath's Hole (The), Cornwall Bolster, a gigantic wrath, wanted St Agnes to be his mistress She told him she would comply when he filled a small hole, which she pointed out to him, with his blood The wrath agreed, not knowing that the hole opened into the sea, and thus the saint cunningly bled the wrath to death, and then pushed him over the cliff The hole is called "The Wrath's Hole" to this day, and the stones about it are coloured with blood-red streaks all over—Polwhele, History of Cornwall, 176 (1813)

Wray (Enoch), "the village patriarch," blind, poor, and 100 years old, but revered for his meekness, resignation, wisdom, piety, and experience—Crabbe, The Village Patriarch (1783)

Wrayburn (Eugene), barrister-at-law, an indolent, idle, moody, whimsical young man, who loves Lizzie Hexam After he is nearly killed by Bradley Headstone, he reforms, and marries Lizzie, who saved his life—Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Wren (Jenny), whose real name was Fanny Cleaver, a dolls' dressmaker, and the friend of Lizzie Hexam, who at one time lodged with her Jenny was a little, deformed girl, with a sharp, shrewd face, and beautiful golden hair She supported herself and her drunken father, whom she reproved as a mother might reprove a child "Oh," she cried to him, pointing her little finger, "you bad old boy! Oh, you naughty, wicked creature! What do you mean by it?"—Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Write about it

To thee explain a thing till all men doubt it
And write about it, goddess and about it
Pope The Dunciad, 1 (came in after ver 177 in the first edition but was omitted in subsequent ones)

Writing on the Wall (The), a secret but mysterious warning of coming danger The reference is to Belshazzar's feast (Dan v 5, 25-28)

Wrong (All in the), a comedy by A Murphy (1761) The principal characters are sir John and lady Restless, sir William Bellmont and his son George, Beverley and his sister Clarissa, Blandford and his daughter Belinda Sir John and lady Restless were wrong in suspecting each other of infidelity, but this misunderstanding made their lives wretched Beverley was deeply in love with Belinda, and was wrong in his jealousy of her, but Belinda was also wrong in not vindicating herself She knew that she was innocent, and felt that Beverley ought to trust her, but she gave herself and him needless torment by permitting a misconception to remain which she might have most easily removed The old men were also wrong Blandford in promising his daughter in marriage to sir William Bellmont's son, seeing she loved Beverley, and sir William, in accepting the promise, seeing his son was plighted to Clarissa A still further complication of wrong occurs Sir John wrongs Beverley in believing him to be intriguing with his wife, and lady Restless wrongs Belinda in supposing that she coquets with her husband, both were pure mistakes, all were in the wrong, but all in the end were set right

Wronghead (Sir Francis), of Bumper Hall, and M P for Guzzledown, a country squire, who comes to town for the season with his wife, son, and eldest daughter Sir Francis attends the House, but gives his vote on the wrong side, and he spends his money on the hope of obtaining a place under Government His wife spends about £100 a day on objects of no use His son is on the point of marrying the "cast mistress" of a swindler, and his daughter of marrying a forger, but Manly interferes to prevent these fatal steps, and sir Francis returns home to prevent utter ruin

Lady Wronghead, wife of sir Francis, a country dame, who comes to London, where she squanders money on worthless objects, and expects to get into "society."

Happily, she is persuaded by Manly to return home before the affairs of her husband are wholly desperate

Squire Richard [Wronghead], eldest son of sir Francis, a country bumpkin

Miss Jenny [Wronghead], eldest daughter of sir Francis, a silly girl, who thinks it would be a fine thing to be called a "countess," and therefore becomes the dupe of one Basset, a swindler, who calls himself a "count"—Vanbrugh and Cibber, The Provoked Husband (1726)

Wurzburg on the Stein, Hochheim on the Main, and Bacharach on the Rhine grow the three best wines of Germany. The first is called Steinwine, the second bock, and the third muscadine

Wyat. Henry Wyat was imprisoned by Richard III, and when almost starved, a cat appeared at the window-grating, and dropped a dove into his hand. This occurred day after day, and Wyat induced the warder to cook for him the doves thus wonderfully obtained

Elijah the Tishbite, while he lay hidden at the brook Cherith, was fed by ravens, who brought "bread and flesh" every morning and evening—1 Kings xiv 6

Wynnebgarthucher, the shield of king Arthur—The Mabinogion ("Killweh and Olwen," twelfth century)

Wynkyn de Worde, the second printer in London (from 1491-1534). The first was Caxton (from 1476-1491). Wynkyn de Worde assisted Caxton in the new art of printing

Wyo'ming, in Pennsylvania, purchased by an American company from the Delaware Indians. It was settled by an American colony, but being subject to constant attacks from the savages, the colony armed in self-defence. In 1778 most of the able-bodied men were called to join the army of Washington, and in the summer of that year an army of British and Indian allies, led by colonel Butler, attacked the settlement, massacred the inhabitants, and burnt their houses to the ground

* * Campbell has made this the subject of a poem entitled Gertrude of Wyoming, but he miscalls the place Wyoming, and makes Brandt, instead of Butler, the leader of the attack

On Susquehanna's side fair Wyo'ming once the loveliest land of all
That see the Atlantic wave their morn restore Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming I (1809)

Wyvill (William de), a steward of the field at the tournament—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Xan'adu, a city mentioned by Coleridge in his Kubla Khan. The idea of this poem is borrowed from the Pilgrimage by Pnrehas (1613), where Xanadu is called "Xaindu." It is said to have occurred to Coleridge in a dream, but the dream was that of memory only

Xanthos, the horse of Achillès. He spoke with a human voice, like Balaam's ass, Adrastus's horse (Arion), Fortunio's horse (Comrade), Mahomet's "horse" (Al Borak), Sâleh's camel, the dog of the seven sleepers (Katmir), the black pigeon of Dodona and Ammon, the king of serpents (Temliba), the serpent which was cursed for tempting Eve, the talking bird called bulbul-hizar, the little green bird of princess Fairstar, the White Cat, cum quibusdam aliis

The mournful Xanthus (says the bard of old)
Of Peleus warlike son the fortune told
Peter Lindar [Dr Wolcott], The Lusitad v (1809)

Xantippe (3 syl), wife of Soerâtès, proverbial for a scolding, nagging, peevish wife. One day, after storming at the philosopher, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head, whereupon Soerâtès simply remarked, "Aye, aye, we always look for rain after thunder"

Xantippe (3 syl), daughter of Cimo'nos. She preserved the life of her old father in prison by suckling him. The guard marvelled that the old man held out so long, and, watching for the solution, discovered the fact

Euphrasia, daughter of Evander, preserved her aged father while in prison in a similar manner (See GREEK DAUGHTER)

Xavier de Belsunce (H François), immortalized by his self-devotion in administering to the plague-stricken at Marseilles (1720-22)

* * Other similar examples are Charles

Borro'meo, cardinal and archbishop of Milan (1538-1584) St Roche, who died in 1327 from the plague caught by him in his indefatigable labours in ministering to the plague-stricken at Piacenza Mompesson was equally devoted to the people of Bham Our own sir John Lawrence, lord mayor of London, is less known, but ought to be held in equal honour, for supporting 40,000 dismissed servants in the great plague

Xenoc'rates (4 syl), a Greek philosopher The courtesan Laïs made a heavy bet that she would allure him from his "prudery," but after she had tried all her arts on him without success, she exclaimed, "I thought he had been a living man, and not a mere stone"

Do you think I am Xenocrates or like the sultan with marble legs? There you leave me tête à tête with Mrs Haller as if my heart were no mere flint — Benjamin (Thompson The Stranger iv 2107)

Xerxes denounced — See Plutarch, Life of Themistocles, art "Sea-fights of Artemisium and Salamis"

Minerva on the bounding prow
Of Athens stood and with the thunder's voice Denounced her terrors on their impious heads [the Persians]

And shook her burning wings Xerxes saw
From Heracleum on the mountain's height,
Throned in her golden car he knew the sign
Celestial felt unrighteous hope forsake
His faltering heart, and turned his face with shame
Alenside Hymn to the Naiads (1767)

Xime'na, daughter of count de Gormez The count was slain by the Cid for insulting his father Four times Ximēna demanded vengeance of the king, but the king, perceiving that the Cid was in love with her, delayed vengeance, and ultimately she married him

Ya'hoo, one of the human brutes subject to the Hony hnhnms [Whin hms] or horses possessed of human intelligence In this tale, the horses and men change places the horses are the chief and ruling race, and man the subject one — Swift, Gulliver's Travels (1726)

Yajū and Majū, the Arabian form of Gog and Magog Gog is a tribe of Turks, and Magog of the Gulan (the Geli or Geli of Ptolemy and Strabo) Al Berdāwī says they were man-eaters Dhu'l-karnain made a rampart of red-hot metal to keep out their incursions

He said to the workmen Bring me iron in large pieces till it fill up the space between these two mountain talns [then] blow with your bellows till it make the iron red hot And he said further Bring me molten brass that I may pour upon it When this wall was finished Gog and Magog could not scale it, neither could they dig through it — Al Kordū xviii

Yakutsk, in Siberia, affords an exact parallel to the story about Carthage Dido, having purchased in Africa as much land as could be covered with a bull's hide, ordered the hide to be cut into thin slips, and thus enclosed land enough to build Byrsa upon This Byrsa ("bull's hide") was the citadel of Carthage, round which the city grew

So with Yakutsk The strangers bought as much land as they could encompass with a cow hide, but, by cutting the hide into slips, they encompassed enough land to build a city on

Yama, a Hindū deity, represented by a man with four arms riding on a bull

Thy great birth, O horse is to be glorified whether first springing from the firmament or from the water inasmuch as thou hast neighed thou hast the wings of the falcon thou hast the limbs of the deer Trita harnessed the horse which was given by Yama, Indra first mounted him Gandharba seized his reins Vasis thou fabricated the horse from the sun Thou O horse art Yama thou art Aditya thou art Trita thou art Soma — The Rig Veda ii

Yellow Dwarf (The), a malignant, ugly imp, who claimed the princess All-fair as his bride, and carried her off to Steel Castle on his Spanish cat, the very day she was about to be married to the beautiful king of the Gold-Mines. The king of the Gold-Mines tried to rescue her, and was armed by a good siren with a diamond sword of magic power, by which he made his way through every difficulty to the princess. Delighted at seeing his betrothed, he ran to embrace her, and dropped his sword. Yellow Dwarf, picking it up, demanded if Gold-Mine would resign the lady, and on his refusing to do so, slew him with the magic sword.
The prince, rushing forward to avert the blow, fell dead on the body of her dying lover.

Yellow Dwarf was so called from his complexion and the strange tree he lived in. He wore wooden shoes and no yellow stuff jacket, and had no hair to hide his large ears. —Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales (The Yellow Dwarf) 1874.

Yellow River (The). The Tiber was called Flumen Flavum, because the water is much discoloured with yellow sand.

Verditable and his e. molla flavus was a. Virgil.

* * The "Sacred Hill" (Mons Sacer), so called because it was held sacred by the Roman people, who retired thither, led by Sicinius, and refused to return home till their debts were remitted, and tribunes of the people were made recognized magistrates of Rome. On the 15th July was fought the battle of the lake Pegillus, and the anniversary was kept by the Romans as a fete day.

Yellow River of China is so called from its colour. The Chinese have a proverb:
Such and such a thing will occur when the Yellow River runs clear, i.e. never.

Yellow Water (The), a water which possessed this peculiar property. If only a few drops were put into a basin, no matter how large, it would produce a complete and beautiful fountain, which would always fill the basin and never overflow it. —Arabian Nights.

In the fairy tale of Chery and Fairstar, by the comtesse D'Aunoy, "the dancing water" did the same (1682).

Much of Bacon's life was passed in a visionary world amidst buildings more sumptuous than the palace of Abaddon and fountains more wonderful than the golden water of Parizade [?]. —Macaulay.

At the door my nets are hanging.
Go and bring them, Yenadiz'ze.
Longfellow, Hiawatha vi (1855).

Yendys (Sydney), the nom de plume of Sydney Dobell (1821—).

* * "Yendys" is merely the word
Sydney reversed.

Yeruti, son of Quirra and Monnema.
His father and mother were of the Guarani race, and the only ones who escaped a small-pox plague which infested that part of Paraguay. Yeruti was born after his parents migrated to the Mondni woods, but his father was killed by a jaguar just before the birth of Mooma (his sister).
When grown to youthful age, a Jesuit pastor induced the three to come and live at St. Joachin, where was a primitive colony of some 2000 souls. Here the mother soon died from the confinement of city life. Mooma followed her ere long to the grave. Yeruti now requested to be baptized, and no sooner was the rite over, than he cried, "Ye are come for me! I am quite ready!" and instantly expired. —Southery, A Tale of Paraguay (1814).

Yew in Churchyards. The yew was substituted for "the sacred palm," because palm trees are not of English growth.

and olyve —Caxton, Directory for Keeping Festivals (1493).

Yezad or Yezdam, called by the Greeks Oromazdes (4 syl), the principle of good in Persian mythology, opposed to Ahriman or Arimannis the principle of evil. Yezad created twenty-four good spirits, and, to keep them from the power of the evil one, enclosed them in an egg, but Ahriman pierced the shell, and hence there is no good without some admixture of evil.

Yezd (1 syl), chief residence of the fire-worshippers. Stephen says they have kept alive the sacred fire on mount Ater Quedah ("mansion of fire") for above 3000 years, and it is the ambition of every true fire-worshipper to die within the sacred city.

From Yezd's eternal Mansion of the Fire —
Where aged spirits in dreams of heaven expire
T Moore Lalla Pookh (The Fire-Worshippers 1817)

Ygerne [Egen], wife of Gorlois lord of Tintagel Castle, in Cornwall. King Uther tried to seduce her, but Ygerne resented the insult, whereupon Uther and Gorlois fought, and the latter was slain. Uther then besieged Tintagel Castle, took it, and compelled Ygerne to become his wife. Nine months afterwards, Uther died, and on the same day was Arthur born.

Then Uther in his wrath and heat, besieged Ygerne within Tintagel and entered in Enforced she was to wed him in her tears
And with a shameful swiftness.
Tennyson Coming of Arthur

Ygg'drasil', the great ash tree which binds together heaven, earth, and hell. Its branches extend over the whole earth, its top reaches heaven, and its roots hell. The three Nornas or Fates sit under the tree, spinning the events of man's life — Scandinavian Mythology.

By the Urdar fount dwelling,
Dry by day from the rill
The Nornas besprinkle
The ash Yggdrasil.
Lord Lytton Harold (1850)

Yguerne (See YGERNE)

Yn'iol, an earl of decayed fortune, father of Enid. He was ousted from his earldom by his nephew Ed'yrn (son of Nudd), called "The Sparrow-Hawk." When Ed'yrn was overthrown by prince Geraint in single combat, he was compelled to restore the earldom to his uncle. He is described in the Mabinogion as "a hoary-headed man, clad in tattered garments" — Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Enid").

He says to Geraint — I lost a great earldom as well as a city and castle and this is how I lost them. I had a nephew and when he came to his strength he commanded of me his property but I withheld it from him.

So he made war upon me and wrested from me all that I possessed. — The Mabinogion (Geraint the Son of Erlin, twelfth century)

Yoglan (Zacharias), the old Jew chemist, in London — Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Yohak, the giant guardian of the caves of Babylon — Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, v (1797)

Yor'ick, the king of Denmark's jester, "a fellow of infinite jest and most excellent fancy" — Shakespeare, Hamlet Prince of Denmark (1596)

Yorick, a humorous and careless parson, of Danish origin, and a descendant of Yorick mentioned in Shakespeare's Hamlet — Sterne, Tristram Shandy (1759)

Yorick, the lively witty sensible and heedless parson is Sterne himself — Sir W. Scott.

Yorick (Mr), the pseudonym of the Rev. Laurence Sterne, attached to his Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768)

York, according to legendary history, was built by Ebranc, son of Gwendolen widow of king Loerin. Geoffrey says it was founded while "David reigned in Judaea," and was called Cacer-branc — British History, ii 7 (1142)

York (New), United States, America, is so called in compliment to the duke of York, afterwards James II. It had been previously called "New Amsterdam" by the Dutch colonists, but when in 1664 its governor, Stuyvesant, surrendered to the English, its name was changed.

York (Geoffrey archbishop of), one of the high justices of England in the absence of Richard Cœur de Lion — Sir W. Scott, The Tuhman (time, Richard I)

York (James duke of), introduced by Sir W. Scott in Woodstock and in Peveril of the Peal Yorke (Oliver), pseudonym of Francis Sylvester Mahony, editor of Fraser's Magazine. It is still edited under the same name.

Yorkshire Bite (A), a specially cute piece of overreaching, entrapping one into a profitless bargain. The monkey who ate the oyster and returned a shell to each litigant affords a good example.

Yorkshire Tragedy (The), author unknown (1604), was at one time printed with the name of Shakespeare.

Young "Whom the gods love die young"—Herodotos, History (See Notes and Queries, October 5, 1879)

* * Quoted by lord Byron in reference to Haidee—Don Juan, iv 12 (1820)

Young America J G Holland says "What we call Young America is made up of about equal parts of irreverence, conceit, and that popular moral quality familiarly known as bias."

Young Chevalier (The), Charles Edward Stuart, grandson of James II. He was the second pretender (1720-1788)

Young England, a set of young aristocrats, who tried to revive the courtly manners of the Chesterfield school. They wore white waistcoats, patronized the pet poor, looked down upon shopkeepers, and were imitators of the period of Louis XIV. Disraeli has immortalized their ways and manners

Young Germany, a literary school, headed by Heinrich Heine [Hi ny], whose aim was to liberate politics, religion, and manners from the old conventional trammels

Young Ireland, followers of Daniel O Connell in politics, but wholly opposed to his abstention from war and insurrection in vindication of "their country's rights"

Young Italy, certain Italian refugees, who associated themselves with the French republican party, called the Carbonnerie Democratique. The society was first organized at Marseilles by Mazzini, and its chief object was to diffuse republican principles

Young Roscius, William Henry West Betty. When only 12 years old, he made £34,000 in fifty-six nights. He appeared in 1803, and very wisely retired from the stage in 1807 (1791-1874)

Young-and-Handsme, a beautiful fairy, who fell in love with Alidorus "the lovely shepherd." Mordicant, an ugly fairy, also loved him, and confined him in a dungeon. Zephyrus loved Young-and-Handsme, but when he found no reciprocity, he asked the fairy how he could best please her. "By liberating the lovely shepherd," she replied. "Fairies, you know, have no power over fairies, but you, being a god, have full power over the whole race." Zephyrus complied with this request, and restored Alidorus to the Castle of Flowers, when Young-and-

Handsme bestowed on him perpetual youth, and married him—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Young-and-Handsme," 1682)

Youwarkee, the name of the gawrey that Peter Wilkins married. She introduced the seaman to Nosmnbdsgrutt, the land of flying men and women—R. Pultock, Peter Wilkins (1750)

Ysaie le Triste [E say' le Treest], son of Tristram and Isold (wife of king Mark of Cornwall). The adventures of this young knight form the subject of a French romance called Isau le Triste (1522)

I did not think it necessary to contemplate the exploits with the gravity of Isale le Triste—Dunlop Ysolde or Ysonde (2 syl), surnamed "The Fair," daughter of the king of Ireland. When sir Tristram was wounded in fighting for his uncle Mark, he went to Ireland, and was cured by the Fair Ysolde. On his return to Cornwall, he gave his uncle such a glowing account of the young princess that he was sent to propose offers of marriage, and to conduct the lady to Cornwall. The brave young knight and the fair damsel fell in love with each other on their voyage, and, although Ysolde married king Mark, she remained to the end her love for sir Tristram. King Mark, jealous of his nephew, banished him from Cornwall, and he went to Wales, where he performed prodigies of valour. In time, his uncle invited him back to Cornwall, but, the guilty intercourse being renewed, he was banished a second time. Sir Tristram now wandered over Spain, Lorraine, and Brittany, winning golden opinions by his exploits. In Brittany, he married the king's daughter, Ysolde or Ysonde of the White Hand, but neither loved her nor lived with her. The rest of the tale is differently told by different authors. Some say he returned to Cornwall, renewed his love with Ysolde the Fair, and was treacherously stabbed by his uncle Mark. Others say he was severely wounded in Brittany, and sent for his aunt, but died before her arrival. When Ysolde the Fair heard of his death, she died of a broken heart, and king Mark buried them both in one grave, over which he planted a rose bush and a vine.

Ysolde or Ysonde or Ysolt of the White Hand, daughter of the king of Brittany. Sir Tristram married her for her name's sake, but never loved her nor lived with her, because he loved his aunt Zadig, the hero and title of a novel by Voltaire. Zadig is a wealthy young Babylonian, and the object of the novel is to show that the events of life are beyond human control.

Zad'kiel (3 syl), angel of the planet Jupiter — Jewish Mythology

Zad'kiel, the pseudonym of lieutenant Richard James Morrison, author of Prophetic Almanac, Handbook of Astrology, etc.

Zadoc, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury.

Zadoc the priest, whom shunning power and place
His lowly mind advanced to David's grace
Pt. I. (1691)

Zaïde (2 syl), a young slave, who pretends to have been ill-treated by Adraste (2 syl), and runs to don Pèdre for protection. Don Pèdre sends her into the house, while he expostulates with Adraste "for his brutality." Now, Adraste is in love with Isidore, a Greek slave kept by don Pèdre, and when Zaïde is called forth, Isidore appears dressed in Zaïde's clothes. "There," says don Pèdre, "take her home, and use her well." "I will," says Adraste, and leads off Isidore — Molière, Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667).

Zaira, the mother of Eva Wentworth. She is a brilliant Italian, courted by de Courey. When deceived by him, she meditates suicide, but forbears, and sees Eva die tranquilly, and the faithless de Courey perish of remorse — Rev. C. R. Maturin, Women (a novel, 1822).

Zakkum or Al Zakkûm, the tree of death, rooted in hell, as the tree of life was in Eden. It is called in the Korân "the cursed tree" (ch. xvii). The fruit is extremely bitter, and any great evil or bitter draught is figuratively called al Zakkûm. The damned eat its bitter fruits and drink scalding hot water (ch. xxxvii).

The unallayable bitterness
Of Zaccoum's fruit accurst.

Southey Thalaba the Destroyer vii. 16 (1797)

Is this a better entertainment, or is it of the tree of al Zakkûm? — Al Korân xxxvii.

Zala, a peculiar ceremony of salutation amongst the Moors.

Zambo, the issue of an Indian and a negro.

Zambullo (Don Cleophas Leandro Perez), the person carried through the air by Asmodeus to the steeple of St.

Salvador, and shown, in a moment of time, the interior of every private dwelling around — Lesage, The Devil on Two Sticks (1707).

Cleaving the air at a greater rate than don Cleophas Leandro Perez Zambullo and his familiar — C. Dickens The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Zam'harir' (Al), that extreme cold to which the wicked shall be exposed after they leave the flames of hell or have drunk of the boiling water there — Sale, Al Korân, vi (notes).

Zam'ora, youngest of the three daughters of Balthazar. She is in love with Rolando, a young soldier, who fancies himself a woman-hater, and in order to win him she dresses in boy's clothes, and becomes his page, under the name of Eugenio. In this character, Zam'ora wins the heart of the young soldier by her fidelity, tenderness, and affection. When the proper moment arrives, she assumes her female attire, and Rolando, declaring she is no woman but an angel, marries her — J. Tobin, The Honeymoon (1804).

Zamti, the Chinese mandarin. His wife was Mandinê, and his son Hamet. The emperor of China, when he was about to be put to death by Ti'murkhan' the Tartar, committed to Zamti's charge his infant son Zaphum, and Zamti brought up this "orphan of China" as his own son, under the name of Ftan. Twenty years afterwards, Zamti was put to the rack by Timurkhan, and died soon afterwards — Murphy, The Orphan of China (1761).

Zanga, the revengeful Moor, the servant of don Alonzo. The Moor hates Alonzo for two reasons: (1) because he killed his father, and (2) because he struck him on the cheek, and although Alonzo has used every endeavour to conciliate Zanga, the revengeful Moor nurses his hate and keeps it warm. The revenge he wreaks is (1) to poison the friendship which existed between Alonzo and don Carlos by accusations against the don, and (2) to embitter the love of Alonzo for Leonora his wife. Alonzo, out of jealousy, has his friend killed, and Leonora makes away with herself. Having thus lost his best beloved, Zanga tells his dupe he has been imposed upon, and Alonzo, mad with grief, stabs himself. Zanga, content with the mischief he has done, is taken away to execution — Edward Young, The Revenge (1721).

* "Zanga" was the great character of Henry Mossop (1729-1773). It was also a favourite part with J. Kemble (1757-1823)

Zano'ni, hero and title of a novel by lord Bulwer Lytton. Zano'ni is supposed to possess the power of communicating with spirits, prolonging life, and producing gold, silver, and precious stones (1842)

Zany of Debate George Canning was so called by Charles Lamb in a sonnet printed in The Champion newspaper. Posterity has not endorsed the judgment or wit of this ill-natured satire (1770-1827)

Zaphimri, the "orphan of China," brought up by Zamti, under the name of Etan

Ere yet the foe burst in
 'Zamti,' said he, preserve my cradled infant
 Save him from ruffians, train his youth to virtue
 He could no more the cruel spoiler seized him
 And dragged my king, from yonder altar dragged him
 Here on the blood-stained pavement while the queen
 And her dear fondlings, in one mingled heap
 Died in each others' arms.

Murphy The Orphan of China III. 1 (1761).

Zaphna, son of Alcānor chief of Mecca. He and his sister Palmira, being taken captives in infancy, were brought up by Mahomet, and Zaphna, not knowing Palmira was his sister, fell in love with her, and was in turn beloved. When Mahomet laid siege to Mecca, he employed Zaphna to assassinate Alcānor, and when he had committed the deed, discovered that it was his own father he had killed. Zaphna would have revenged the deed on Mahomet, but died of poison.—James Miller, Mahomet the Impostor (1740)

Zara, an African queen, widow of Aibnuc'aim, and taken captive by Manuel king of Granada, who fell in love with her. Zara, however, was intensely in love with Osmyn (alias prince Alphonso of Valentia), also a captive. Alphonso, being privately married to Alnuc'ina, could not return her love. She designs to liberate Osmyn, but, seeing a dead body in the prison, fancies it to be that of Osmyn, and kills herself by poison.—W. Congreve, The Mourning Bride (1697)

* * "Zara" was one of the great characters of Mrs Siddons (1755-1831)

Zu'a (in French Zaïre), the heroine and title of a tragedy by Voltaire (1733), adapted for the English stage by Aaron Hill (1733). Zara is the daughter of Lusignan d'Outremer king of Jerusalem and brother of Nerestan. Twenty years ago, Lusignan and his two children had been taken captives. Nerestan was four years old at the time, and Zara, a mere infant, was brought up in the seraglio. Osman the sultan fell in love with her, and promised to make her his sultana, and as Zara loved him for himself, her happiness seemed complete. Nerestan, having been sent to France to obtain ransoms, returned at this crisis, and Osman fancied that he observed a familiarity between Zara and Nerestan, which roused his suspicions. Several things occurred to confirm them, and at last a letter was intercepted, appointing a rendezvous between them in a "secret passage" of the seraglio. Osman met Zara in the passage, and stabbed her to the heart. Nerestan was soon seized, and being brought before the sultan, told him he had slain his sister, and the sole object of his interview was to inform her of her father's death, and to bring her his dying blessing. Osman now saw his error, commanded all the Christian captives to be set at liberty, and stabbed himself.

Zaramilla, wife of Tinaerio king of Micomicon, in Egypt. He was told that his daughter would succeed him, that she would be dethroned by the giant Pandafilando, but that she would find in Spain the gallant knight of La Mancha, who would redress her wrongs, and restore her to her throne.—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. iv. 3 (1605)

Zaraph, the angel who loved Nama. It was Nama's desire to love intensely and to love holily, but as she fixed her love on an angel and not on God, she was doomed to abide on earth till the day of consummation, then both Nama and Zaraph will be received into the realms of everlasting love.—T. Moore, Loves of the Angels (1822)

Zauberflöte (Die), a magic flute, which had the power of inspiring love. When bestowed by the powers of darkness, the love it inspired was sensual love, but when by the powers of light, it became subservient to the very highest and holiest purposes. It guided Tamino and Pamina through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis).—Mozart, Die Zauberflöte (1791)

Zayde, the chief character in a French romance by Mde Lafayette (seventeenth century)

Zeal (Arabella), in Shadwell's comedy The Fair Quaker of Deal (1617).

This comedy was altered by L. Thompson in 1720

Zedekiah, one of general Harrison's servants—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Ze'gris and the Abencerra'ges [A' ten ee rah' le], an historical romance, professing to be history, and printed at Alen'la in 1604. It was extremely popular, and had a host of imitations

Zeid, Mahomet's freedman. "The prophet" adopted him as his son, and gave him Zenab (or Zenobia) for a wife, but falling in love with her himself, Zeid gave her up to the prophet. She was Mahomet's cousin, and within the prohibited degrees, according to the Korân

Zenab or ZLNOIA, wife of Zeid. Mahomet's freedman and adopted son. As Mahomet wished to have her, Zeid resigned her to the prophet. Zenab was the daughter of Amima, Mahomet's aunt

Zenab (2 syl), wife of Hodeirah (3 syl) an Arab. She lost her husband and all her children, except one, a boy named Thal'aba. Weary of life, the angel of death took her, while Thalaba was yet a youth—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer (1797)

Zeleucus or Zaleucus, a Loerensian lawgiver, who enacted that adulterers should be deprived of their eyes. His own son being proved guilty, Zeleucus pulled out one of his own eyes, and one of his son's eyes, that "two eyes might be paid to the law"—Valerius Maximus, De Iactis Diciturque, v 5, exl 3

How many now will tread Zeleucus steps?
G. L'Escoigne. The Steele Glas (died 1577)

Zel'ica, the betrothed of Azim. When it was rumoured that he had been slain in battle, Zelica joined the harem of the Veiled Prophet as "one of the elect of paradise." Azim returned from the wars, discovered her retreat, and advised her to flee with him, but she told him that she was now the prophet's bride. After the death of the prophet, Zelica assumed his veil, and Azim, thinking the veiled figure to be the prophet, rushed on her and killed her.—T. Moore, Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet," etc., 1817)

Zelis, the daughter of a Persian officer. She was engaged to a man in the middle age of life, but just prior to the wedding he forsook her for a richer bride. The father of Zelis challenged him, but was killed. Zelis now took lodging with a courtesan, and went with her to Italy, but when she discovered the evil courses of her companion, she determined to become a nun, and started by water for Rome. She was taken captive by corsairs, and sold from master to master, till at length Hingpo rescued her, and made her his wife—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World (1759)

Zelma'ne (3 syl), the assumed name of Pyrœolês when he put on female attire—Sir Philip Sidney, Arcadia (1590)

Sir Philip has preserved such a matchless decorum that Pyrœolês' manhood suffers no stain for the effeminacy of Zelma'ne—C. Lamb.

Zelu'eo, the only son of a noble Sicilian family, accomplished and fascinating, but spoiled by maternal indulgence, and at length rioting in dissipation. In spite of his gaiety of manner, he is a standing testimony that misery accompanies vice—Dr. John Moore, Zeluco (a novel, 1786)

Ze'mma, one of the four who, next in authority to Uriel, preside over our earth—Klopstock, The Messiah, iii (1748)

Zemzem, a fountain at Mecca. The Mohammedans say it is the very spring which God made to slake the thirst of Ishmael, when Hagar was driven into the wilderness by Abraham. A bottle of this water is considered a very valuable present, even by princes

There were also a great many bottles of water from the fountain of Zemzem at Mecca.—Arabian Nights (The Purveyor's Story)

Zemzem, a well, where common believers abide, who are not equal to prophets or martyrs. The prophets go direct to paradise, and the latter await the resurrection in the form of green birds—Al Korân

Zenel'ophon, the beggar-girl who married king Cophet'ua of Africa. She is more generally called Penel'ophon—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, act iv se 1 (1591)

Zenjebl, a stream in paradise, flowing from the fountain Salsabil. The word means "ginger"

Their attendants [in paradise] shall go round with vessels of silver and there shall be given to them to drink cups of wine mixed with the water of Zenjebl.—Al Korân lxxvi.

Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who claimed the title of "Queen of the East." She was defeated by Aurelian and taken prisoner in A. D. 273

Zeno'cia, daughter of Charino, and the chaste troth-plight wife of Arnol'do. While Arnol'do is wantonly loved by the rich Hippol'ya, Zenobia is dishonourably pursued by the governor count Clodio — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Custom of the Country (1647)

Zephalinda, a young lady who has tasted the delights of a London season, taken back to her home in the country, to find enjoyment in needlework, dull aunts, and rooks

Over her cold coffee trifle with her spoon
Count the slow clock, and dine exact at noon
Pope Epistle to Miss Blount (1715)

Zeph'on, a cherub who detected Satan squatting in the garden, and brought him before Gabriel the archangel. The word means "searcher of secrets." Milton makes him "the guardian angel of paradise."

Ithuriel and Zephon, with winged speed
Search thro' this garden leave unsearched no nook
But chide where those two fair creatures lodge
Now laid perhaps asleep secure of harm.
Milton Paradise Lost iv 788 (1665)

Zephyr (See MORGAN, p 660)

Zerbinette (3 syl'), the daughter of Argante (2 syl'), stolen from her parents by gypsies when four years old, and brought up by them. Leandre, the son of seignior Géronte, fell in love with her, and married her, but the gypsies would not give her up without being paid £30. Scapin wrung this money from Géronte, pretending it was to ransom Léandre, who had been made a prisoner by some Turks, who intended to sell him in Algiers for a slave unless his ransom was brought within two hours. The old man gave Scapin the money grudgingly, and Scapin passed it over to the gypsies, when a bracelet led to the discovery that Zerbinette was the daughter of seignior Argante, a friend of Léandre's father, and all parties were delighted at the different revelations — Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671)

* * In the English version, called The Cheats of Scapin, by Thomas Otway, Zerbinette is called "Lucia," her father Argante is called "Thrift," Léandre is Anglicized into "Leander," Géronte becomes "Gripe," and the sum of money is £200

Zerbi'no, son of the king of Scotland, and intimate friend of Orlando — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Zerh'na, a rustic beauty, about to be married to Masetto, when don Giovanni allured her away under the promise of making her a fine lady — Mozart, Don Giovanni (opera, 1787)

Zerl'na, in Auber's opera of Fra Diavolo (1830)

Zesbet, daughter of the sage Oueha of Jerusalem. She had four husbands at the same time, viz, Abdal Motallab (the sage), Yaarab (the judge), Abou'telub (a doctor of law), and Temimdari (a soldier). Zesbet was the mother of the prophet Mahomet. Mahomet appeared to her before his birth in the form of a venerable old man, and said to her

You have found favour before Allah. Look upon me I am Mahomet, the great friend of God, he who is to enlighten the earth. Thy virtues Zesbet and thy beauty have made me prefer thee to all the daughters of Mecca. Thou shalt for the future be named Aminata [sic]. Then turning to the husbands he said "You have seen me she is yours and you are hers. Labour then with a holy zeal to bring me into the world to enlighten it. All men who shall follow the law which I shall preach, may have four wives, but Zesbet shall be the only woman who shall be lawful, the wife of four husbands at once. It is the least privilege I can grant the woman of whom I choose to be born." — Corneille de Caylus, Oriental Tales (History of the Birth of Mahomet, 1743).

(The mother of Mahomet is generally called Aminna, not Aminata)

Zeus (1 syl'), the Grecian Jupiter. The word was once applied to the blue firmament, the upper sky, the arch of light, but in Homeric mythology, Zeus is king of gods and men, the conscious embodiment of the central authority and administrative intelligence which holds states together, the supreme ruler, the sovereign source of law and order, the fountain of justice, and final arbiter of disputes Zeuxis and Parrhasios. In a contest of skill, Zeuxis painted some grapes so naturally that birds pecked at them. Confident of success, Zeuxis said to his rival, "Now let Parrhasios draw aside his curtain, and show us his production." "You behold it already," replied Parrhasios, "and have mistaken it for real drapery." Whereupon, the prize was awarded to him, for Zeuxis had deceived the birds, but Parrhasios had deceived Zeuxis.

MIRÓ's painting of a cow was mistaken by a herd of bulls for a living animal, and Apellós's painting of the horse Bucephalos deceived several marcs who ran about it neighing.

QUINTIN MATSYS, of Antwerp, fell love with Lisa, daughter of Johann Mandyn, but Mandyn vowed his daughter should marry only an artist. Matsys studied painting, and brought his first picture to show how Mandyn was not at home, but had left a picture of his favourite pupil Hans Floris, representing the "fallen angels," on an easel. Quentin painted a bee on the outstretched limb, and when Mandyn returned he tried to brush it off, whereupon the deception was discovered. The old man's heart was moved, and he gave Quentin his daughter in marriage, saying, "You are a true artist, greater than Johann Mandyn." This painting is in Antwerp Cathedral.

Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that King Felipe IV, entering the studio, thought the painting was the admiral, and spoke to it as such, reproving the supposed officer for being in the studio wasting his time, when he ought to have been with the fleet.

Zillah, beloved by Hamuel a brutish eat. Zillah rejected his suit, and Hamuel vowed ven, once. Accordingly, he gave out that Zillah had intercourse with the devil, and she was condemned to be burnt alive. God averted the flames, which consumed Hamuel, but Zillah stood unharmed, and the snail to which she was bound threw forth white roses, "the first ever seen on earth since paradise was lost"—Southey. (See Rose, p. 915, col. 1, last art.)

Zimmerman (Idam), the old burgher of Soleure, one of the Swiss deputies to Charles "the Bold" of Burgundy—Sir W. Scott, Annals of Germany (time, Edward IV.)

Zim'ri, one of the six Wise Men of the East led by the guiding star to Jesus.

Lord Macaulay (1841) but they treated him with contempt as a Jew. He prevailed on one of them to befriend him.—Macaulay's Works (1841)

Zimri, in Drude's satire of Abalom and Achitophel, is the second duke of Buckingham. As Zimri conspired against Aza king of Judah, so the duke of Buckingham "formed parties and joined factions"—1 Ains vi. 9.

One of the chief's were princes in the land
In the first rank of those did Zimri stand—
A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one but all—a virtuous one,
A life in children always in the wrong—
Was everything by turns, and nothing long.
1.1.1 (1641)

Zino'bi (Mohammed), king of Syria, tributary to the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, of very humane disposition—Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love")

Zineu'ra, in Boccaccio's Decameron (day 11, Nov. 9), is the "Imogen" of Shakespeare's Cymbeline. She assumed male attire with the name of Sicurano da Finale (Imogen assumed male attire and the name Ildelf), Zineu'ra's husband was Bernard Lomellin, and the villain was Ambroce (Imogen's husband was Posthumus Leonatus, and the villain Iachimo). In Shakespeare, the British king Cymbeline takes the place assigned by Boccaccio to the sultan.

Ziska or Zizka, John of Trocznow, a Bohemian nobleman, leader of the Hussites. He fought under Henry V at Agincourt. His sister had been seduced by a monk, and whenever he heard the shriek of a catholic at the stake, he called it "his sister's bridal song." The story goes that he ordered his men at death to be made into drum-heads (1360-1424).

Some say that John of Trocznow was called "Ziska" because he was "one-eyed," but that is a mistake—Ziska was a family name, and does not mean "one-eyed," either in the Polish or Bohemian language.

For every page of text shall a life
Of your sister's be given out on a drum,
Like Ziska's skin to be at alarm to all
I shall cry woe to.

Lyron Werner 1. (1827)

For every page of text shall a life
Of your sister's be given out on a drum,
Like Ziska's skin to be at alarm to all
I shall cry woe to.

Lyron Werner 1. (1827)

Zobeide [Zobaydah], half-sister of Amine. She had two sisters, who were turned into little black dogs by way of punishment for eating Zobeide and "the prince" from the petrified city into the sea. Zobeide was rescued by the "fairy serpent," who had metamorphosed the two sisters, and Zobeide was enjoined to give the two dogs a hundred lashes every day. Ultimately, the two dogs were restored to their proper forms, and married two calenders, "sons of kings." Zobeide married the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, and Amine was restored to Amm, the caliph's son, to whom she was already married—Arabian Nights ("History of Zobeide").

While the caliph was absent from Bagdad, Zobeide cursed his favourite (named Fetnab) to be buried alive, for which she was divorced—Arabian Nights ("Ganem, the Slave of Love").

Zohak, the giant who keeps the "mouth of hell." He was the fifth of the Pischadian dynasty, and was a lineal descendant of Shedad king of Ad. He murdered his predecessor, and invented both slaying men alive and killing them by crucifixion. The devil kissed him on the shoulders, and immediately two serpents grew out of his back and fed constantly upon him. He was dethroned by the famous blacksmith of Ispahan, and appointed by the devil to keep hell-gate—D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale (1697).

Zohara, the queen of love, and mother of mischief. When Harut and Marut were selected by the host of heaven to be judges on earth, they judged righteous judgment till Zohara, in the shape of a lovely woman, appeared before them with her complaint. They then both fell in love with her and tried to corrupt her, but she flew from them to heaven, and the two angel-judges were for ever shut out.

The Persian Magi have a somewhat similar tradition of these two angels, but add that after their "fall," they were suspended by the feet, head downwards, in the territory of Babel.

The Jews tell us that Shamhoza, "the judge of all the earth," debauched himself with women, repented, and by way of penance was suspended by the feet, head downwards, between heaven and earth—Bereshit rabbi (in Gen 11:2).

Zohauk, the Nubian slave, a disguise assumed by Sir Kenneth—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I).

Zoilos (in Latin Zoilus), a grammarian, witty, shrewd, and spiteful. He was nicknamed "Homer's Scourge" (Homero-mastix), because he assailed the Iliad and Odyssey with merciless severity. He also flew at Plato, Isocrates, and other high game.

The Sword of Zoilos, the pen of a critic.

Zoilus J. Dennis, the critic whose attack on Pope produced The Dunciad, was so called (1657-1733).

Zoleikha (3 syl), Potiphar's wife—Sale, Al Koran, vii (note).

Zone Tennyson refers to the zone or girdle of Orion in the lines

Like those three stars of the airy giant's zone,
That glitter burnished by the frosty dark.
The Princess, v (1830)

Zophiel [Zo fel], "of cherubim the swiftest wing." The word means "God's spy." Zophiel brings word to the heavenly host that the rebel crew were preparing a second and fiercer attack.

Zophiel of cherubim the swiftest wing
Came flying and in mid air aloud thus cried
"Arm, warriors, arm for fight!"

Milton Paradise Lost, vi. 635 (1665)

Zorai'da (3 syl), a Moorish lady, daughter of Agimora to the richest man in Barbary. On being baptized, she had received the name of Maria, and, eloping with a Christian captive, came to Andalusia—Cervantes, Don Quixote I iv 9-11 ("The Captive," 1605).

Zorphee (2 syl), a fairy in the romance of Amadis de Gaul (thirteenth century).

Zosimus, the patriarch of the Greek Church—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Zounds, a corrupt contraction of "his wounds," as zoo's is "his hooks," and z'd death "his death." Of course, by "his" Jesus Christ is meant. "Odd splinter" is a contraction of Gods plut und hur nails ("God's blood and the nails"). Sir John Perrot, a natural son of Henry VIII, was the first to use the oath of "God's wounds," which queen Elizabeth adopted, but the ladies of her court muned it into zounds and zouter/ins.

Zulal, that soft, clear, and delicious water which the happy drink in paradise.

"Barishing beauty universal mistress of hearts" replied I thou art the water of Zulal I burn with the thirst of love and must die if you reject me.—Comte de Caylus Oriental Tales (The Basket 1743).

Zuleika [Zu lee' kah], daughter of Gassier [Djaf' fir] pacha of Abydos. Falling in love with Selim, her cousin, she flees with him, and promises to be his bride, but the father tracks the fugitives and shoots Selim, whereupon Zuleika dies of a broken heart—Byron, Bride of Abydos (1813).

Never was a faultless character more delicately or more justly delineated than that of Lord Byron's Zuleika. Her lofty her intelligence her strict sense of duty and her undeviating love of truth appear to have been originally blended in her mind rather than inculcated by education. She is always natural always attractive always affectionate and it must be admitted that her affections are not unworthily bestowed.—George Ellis.

Zulichrum (The enchanted princess of), in the story told by Agelastes the cynic, to count Robert.—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Zulzul, the sage whose life was saved in the form of a rat by Gedy the youngest of the four sons of Coreud. Zulzul gave him, in gratitude, two poniards, by the help of which he could climb the highest tree or most inaccessible castle—Gucullette, Chinese Tales ("Coreud and His Four Sons," 1728).

1. Introduction
 The purpose of this study is to investigate the effects of the proposed system on the performance of the system. The study is organized as follows: Section 2 describes the system architecture. Section 3 describes the experimental setup. Section 4 presents the results of the experiments. Section 5 discusses the conclusions.

2. System Architecture
 The system architecture is shown in Figure 1. The system consists of a client and a server. The client is responsible for sending requests to the server. The server is responsible for processing the requests and returning the results to the client.

3. Experimental Setup
 The experiments were conducted on a system with the following specifications: 1. Processor: Intel Core i7-4790K 4.0GHz. 2. Memory: 16GB DDR4. 3. Storage: 1TB SSD. 4. Operating System: Windows 10.

4. Results
 The results of the experiments are shown in Table 1. The table shows the performance of the system for different values of the parameter n . The performance is measured in terms of the number of requests processed per second.

5. Conclusions
 The results of the experiments show that the proposed system significantly improves the performance of the system. The performance increases as the value of n increases.

 OSSIAN. Celtic warrior poet, said to have lived in the third century
 Poems published by James Macpherson consist of two epics viz. "Fingal" and "Temora," and several smaller prose poems 1760-63
 N B—Dr Blair, lord Kames, Gray (the poet), and sir John Sinclair maintained that Macpherson's poems were genuine.
 Dr Johnson, David Hume, Laing, and Pindar maintained they were more or less fabrications of Macpherson
 No man can wish a higher honour than to be the author of such a series of poems so wholly original, and so full of poetic inventions, beautiful similes, happy turns of thought, and poetic gems No doubt the style is too abrupt, probably much of the scenery is purely imaginary, but there never was but one Ossian

No one will for a moment suppose that the above Appendix is wholly, or anything like wholly, an original compilation, although several living authors and publishers have rendered great assistance when other sources of information have failed. The main part of the Appendix has been selected from Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica, Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliographica, Brunet's Manuel du Libraire, Lowndes's Bibliographical Manual, Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature (largely taken from Watt's book), Bouillet's Dictionnaire d'histoire, Cates's and Cooper's Dictionaries, Woodward and Cates's Encyclopædia of Chronology, the several volumes of The Men of the Times, Martin's Contemporary Biography, The Encyclopædia Britannica, Chambers's Encyclopædia, Craik's Literature and Learning, Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature, Hole's Biographical Dictionary, Phillips's Dictionary of Biographical Reference, the Catalogues of the British Museum, The Oracle, and in some cases Notes and Queries. When all these authorities have failed, the catalogues of Quaritch, Gemmell, Higham, Hiltchan Smith and others have been searched. By means of the American and English Publishers' Catalogues, dates otherwise unknown have often been eliminated and sometimes a biographical dictionary containing lives in extenso has furnished useful though generally very imperfect information. The standard poets published by Bell, Johnson and Chalmers, Sonthey, Bohn, etc., have been used for the dates and works of the poets contained in their collections and the possession of an extensive library has been of some service, though not much, as the first edition has been the one required, but not often the one possessed. Whitaker's Almanacs (from the beginning) have supplied the obituaries of recent authors, and a gentleman in the British Museum has assisted in obtaining dates to long lists submitted to him. With all this search and toil (the work of above four thousand hours), the difficulty has not in all cases been surmounted for modern publishers scrupulously omit to date their books and even in their catalogues observe no chronological order.

It was found practically impossible to sign each article with the authority, because few have been taken in their entirety from any one source, almost all have been supplemented, corrected, or otherwise altered, and such an addition would have materially enlarged the bulk of the Appendix, already too much overgrown.

AUTHORS AND DATES OF DRAMAS AND OPERAS

If any discrepancy is observed between the dates given in this list and those in the body of the book, the dates here given are to be preferred. It must be borne in mind that the date of some plays is purely conjectural, and can be assigned only approximately; and in not a few instances authorities differ. Great labour has been bestowed on this list, which is wholly original.
